The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative. The Committee also noted that the discriminatory employment situation with respect to members of certain religious groups had not changed since the last time the Committee discussed this problem. The Committee was of the opinion that the Government should take the necessary steps to guarantee that there was no discrimination in respect of employment, in law or in practice, on the grounds of religion. The Committee urged the Government, in its next report, to supply all the information requested by the Committee of Experts in this respect in order to show that genuine progress had been made towards full application, both in law and in practice, of the Convention. The Committee noted the Government representative's statement that these questions could also be dealt with by the mission on standards that the Government was ready to receive in the near future.

Romania (ratification: 1973) The Government has communicated the following information:

The Government has supplied the text of Government Decision No. 461/1991, respecting the system of tuition in Romania. It has also given the assurance that the conclusions and recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry would be made accessible to the organisations of employers and workers.

Furthermore, the Government has provided information on the following points:

I. Progress made in the legislative field concerning the application of the provisions of the Convention

1. Human rights

Through Act No. 9/1991, the Romanian Institute for Human Rights has been established under the supervision of Parliament.

2. National minorities

Through Government Decree No. 137/1993, a Council for National Minorities was created at the beginning of April 1993. The Council has discussed and approved its organisational structures and the regulations for its functioning and has established its work programme for 1993. The Council has also decided on the constitution of a public non-governmental, non-profit establishment of the national minorities of Romania. Act No. 92/1992 respecting judicial organization establishes the right to have an interpreter before the judicial instances for members of national minorities. Governmental Decree No. 343/1990 has authorized the Ministry for Culture to grant subventions to certain publications of national minorities. Under Governmental Decree No. 677/1991, the creation of a Centre for European Studies on Ethnic Problems has been approved.

3. Reparations to persons discriminated before December 1989

Legislative Decree No. 118/1990 concerns the granting of compensation to persons prosecuted for political reasons.

4. Cooperation with the social partners

Under Decree No. 860/1992, an office for the relations with employers' organizations and trade unions has been created within the Government apparatus.

II. The situation of the gypsies

The census of January 1992 shows that the number of gypsies is 409,723 (representing 1.8 per cent of the population). With respect to the 1977 census which certified a number of 227,398 persons of gypsy nationality, their number has increased by more than 80 per cent, while the population has only increased by 5.6 per cent (22.8 million persons). According to the concept and the practical action of the Government, the gypsies are not and cannot be considered as marginalized. There has not been and there are no legal provisions which would hinder, in any way, the access for children of gypsies to education, or which could generate any kind of discrimination. An opinion poll which was recently undertaken by the Romanian Academy — the Institute for the Quality of Life — has provided evidence of the following aspects concerning the school education of gypsies: 71.4 per cent of the men and 64.5 per cent of the women know how to read.

The employment situation:

- Men:
  - 38.5 per cent – wage earners
  - 25.4 per cent – individual activities
  - 22.3 per cent – unemployed
  - 7.6 per cent – retired
  - 2.1 per cent – employers
  - Approx. 5 per cent – other activities
- Women:
  - 70.8 per cent – unemployed
  - 15.6 per cent – wage earners
  - 8.4 per cent – individual activities
  - 4.8 per cent – retired
  - 0.4 per cent – other activities
- Qualifications of the adult population:
  - 79.4 per cent – unqualified
  - 16.1 per cent – modern occupations
  - 3.9 per cent – traditional occupations
  - 0.6 per cent – other activities

The increase in unemployment has touched the gypsy population. The dissolution of the agricultural production cooperatives has led to the dramatic decrease in employment (the majority of gypsies had no land and those who had land have sold it). At the same time, the almost "officialized" theft of agriculture property of the State is no longer possible under the new statute of the property of the land. The level of qualification of the gypsy population is reduced. The majority of men is unqualified, as can be observed from the above statistics. Non-participation in education is increasing at a significant rate in the present children's generation. The low level of school tuition influences ocupational training and, consequently, employment.

The following measures have been taken to ensure a better integration of the gypsy population and to permit it to exercise fully its minority rights:

- on 6 April 1993, a Council for the National Minorities was constituted, whose aim is to establish relations with the legally constituted bodies of national minorities, including those of the gypsies;
- within the Ministry for Culture and Tuition, specialized departments have been set up exclusively for the problems of the national minorities;
- within the Ministry for Labour and Social Protection there is a programme for the social promotion and the resolution of labour problems of gypsies. A draft Government Decree to implement the programme has been put forward;
- four times a week, the national television broadcasts the programme "Together" for the national minorities, other than those for the Hungarian and German minorities, who have their own programmes;
- Gypsy publications (Aven Amentza and Romane Divana) and mixed daily newspapers are published in numerous towns — Bucarest, Slobozia, Sibiu, Timisoara;
- the "Gypsy Centre for Social Intervention and Studies" has been established in Romania as a subsidiary of the public cultural establishment "Rromani Baht" (with headquarters in Warsaw);
- measures have been taken to train gypsy children who, at the end of their studies, will work as primary school teachers in the communities in which gypsies are most numerous;

At the same time, intensive efforts are being undertaken to set up an establishment for gypsies in Bucarest in order to resolve their daily problems. This idea has also been presented at the international seminar in Snagov (29.04.-02.05.1993) concerning social policies in the daily life of the gypsy communities in central and eastern Europe. On this occasion, the President of Romania, Mr. Ion Iliescou, in his message to the participants of the seminar, expressed his appreciation of this idea, considering that it was very useful for the resolution of the gypsies' problems.

III. The situation of employed women in Romania

In Romania, respect of the provisions of the Convention for women is ensured through legislation as well as through its application in practice. The results of the policy on equality of opportunity and treatment of women in employment may easily be deducted from the development of the economic process and from the statistical data concerning the employment of women.

1. Legislation

Equality of opportunity and treatment of women in employment and occupation constitutes a part of the fundamental principle of equality of rights, assimilated in Romanian law through international treaties ratified by Romania (articles 11(2) and 16 of the Constitution of Romania):

Art. 11(2) Treaties ratified by Parliament in accordance with the law are part of the internal law.

Art. 16(1) Citizens are equal before the law and the public authorities, without privileges or discrimination.

Equality of opportunity and treatment for women in employment matters is reflected in the following ways:

(a) The right to work. Access of women to employment and occupation

Article 38 of the Romanian Constitution stipulates that the right to work may not be limited, the choice of profession and of job is free. In Romania, every person, regardless of sex, is free to choose the activity he or she wishes to pursue.

The provisions of the Constitution are completed by the provisions of Act No. 30 of 15 November 1990 respecting the hiring of workers with regard to their competences. Section 2 of this Act states that any discrimination during the hiring of workers for political, ethnical, religious, age, gender and material reasons is forbidden by law. This provision once again confirms the equality of opportunity and treatment in employment between women and men, i.e. that during the hiring of workers any discrimination is forbidden. Competence is the sole criterion to be observed during the hiring of workers in posts in the state institutions, administrative bodies and any other budgetary units. In other enterprises and autonomous bodies, employment is undertaken according to specific criteria, but in strict observance of section 2 of the above Act. It is stressed that in this case a worker may not be taken on in a discriminatory manner, but only within the limits of Article 1, paragraph 2 of Convention No. 111.

(b) Terms and conditions of employment

Equality of opportunity and treatment between women and men, as far as payment and social protection are concerned, is stipulated in article 38 of the Constitution which states that (2) Wage earners have a right to social protection. The measures of protection concern safety and health, work of women and young persons, minimum salary, weekly rest, annual leave, work in difficult conditions and other particular situations; and (4) For work of equal value there is equality of payment between the male and female workforce.

(c) Vocational training

Being founded on the right to tuition at all levels, there is real equality of opportunity and treatment between women and men in all categories of vocational training and qualification. Article 32(1) of the Constitution states that the right to tuition is ensured through compulsory general and secondary schooling, through vocational training and higher education, as well as through other instruction and further training.

2. The situation of the female workforce in Romania

(a) The evolution to date

In Romania, the female workforce has undergone a similar evolution to the evolution on the international labour market. Women want to and have to work for a good part of their lives. Thus, the percentage they represent in the active population has continually increased. In the last decades, two important factors have contributed to the increase of the number of wage-earning women: the upward tendency of the economy, particularly the industrial development and migration from village to town, in which an important number of women is included. Until 1989, the number of wage-earning women had continually increased, as well as their proportion among the total of wage earners and among the entire active population. In 1985, in an active population of 10,586,100 persons of which 7,689,300 were wage earners, women wage earners represented 39.4 per cent of wage earners. In 1990 this figure was 41.8 per cent and in 1991 it was 42.3 per cent. In Romania, women have gradually penetrated all sectors and occupations of which quite a number was exclusively reserved to men. A still increasing number of women have found themselves in posts of high qualification, with responsibilities and the power to take decisions. Women predominate in certain branches of the economy. This, however, is linked more to specific aspects of such activities, which are more appropriate to women's work, than to a deliberate limitation concerning the occupations in which women work. It may be seen from the statistics concerning the year 1991 that salaried women represent a more important proportion in health services and in social assistance (72.8 per cent), in teaching (68 per cent), in financial and insurance institutions (71.9 per cent), in tourism, hotels and restaurants (67.3 per cent), in commerce (58.6 per cent) and in the manufacturing industry (46.9 per cent). In absolute figures, the manufacturing industry has the highest participation of salaried women (1,472,800 wage earners in 1991). One explanation for this is that until now the manufacturing industry was the dominant economic sector, and it is only now that the service sector is going to develop strongly.

(b) The actual crisis and the decrease in the female workforce

Unemployment was not existent in Romania until 1990. During 1992 and the first months of 1993, it saw an explosive growth, becoming a large-scale phenomenon (presently 1,060,000 unemployed). The female workforce is hardest hit by this phenomen. The reasons are of an objective nature and they comprise mainly: the reduction of employment during the present transition to a market economy and during the structural reform which resulted in a market decrease in production; and the necessary restructuring of industry, especially in inefficient branches and enterprises, with the effect that the female workforce of these units has been touched by the massive dismissals that have occurred. For these reasons, more than 60 per cent of the unemployed are women.

(c) Perspectives for re-integration of the female workforce into work

It is considered that in the framework of the solutions and the measures taken by the Romanian Government to reduce unemployment, women have a special and somewhat favourised position. This fact is confirmed by the process of requalification. In 1992, two-thirds of the unemployed who have participated in courses of vocational training were women, in professions that were specific to them (knitters, tailors, saleswomen, secretaries, etc.). The chances of re-integration of women in employment are very high, especially in view of the development of the service sector — which so far was not very developed — and into which women may integrate more easily. It must be taken into account that in Romania the female workforce has received extensive school instruction.

In addition, a Government representative affirmed his Government's commitment to implement ratified ILO Conventions. He further stated his Government's awareness that much remained to be done to create a new society in Romania. Despite the adoption of new laws, the actual situation was more complex than the current legal standards. Transition to a market economy involved many complicated problems. Economic reform policies and the decrease in productivity of labour had resulted in distortions in the national employment programme and in the population's income. His Government was also concerned by the rapid growth in the unemployment rate which was affecting a large number of young people and women. His Government planned to make a big effort in education and training, as well as in the retraining of the unemployed, as a way firmly to combat unemployment. Agreement had been reached following tripartite negotiations and consultations at the beginning of May 1993 on the national minimum gross wage, on the institutional framework for facilitating relations between workers' and employers' organizations and the Government, on the establishment of a budget ensuring a decent standard of living and on the machinery for fixing minimum wages. The Government was also instituting a tripartite committee on social policy to conduct tripartite consultations and manage various social and labour matters. With regard to the elimination of various forms of discrimination, he recalled the recent creation of the Council for National Minorities. This Council had the fundamental objective of giving priority to relations with organizations of national minorities, the respect for laws dealing with equality of rights of all citizens, as well as the recognition and the guarantee of the rights of peoples belonging to national minorities, in particular with regard to the preservation, development and expression of their ethnic, cultural, linguistic and religious identity, as guaranteed in the Constitution of Romania and the international treaties to which Romania was a party. With respect to instruction in the various native languages, 2,831 such centres, representing 9.9 per cent of the facilities for education in Romania, were currently organized constituting an increase of 683 centres compared with the figures for 1989. A law had recently been adopted relating to reparations for discrimination suffered by persons persecuted for political reasons. This law provided for a monthly non-taxable compensation, as well as free assistance and medicine supplied by the health services of the State. The Parliament approved such reparations provided for in the law, even though the amounts involved were more symbolic, in order to remedy the situation of persons concerned who only had access to poorly remunerated jobs and insufficient pensions calculated on the basis of such remuneration and resulting from the errors committed by the previous Communist authorities.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for the information provided to this Committee. They recalled the long history of this case which had previously been the subject of a special paragraph of this Committee's report as well as the subject of a Commission of Inquiry. It involved different aspects of the Convention, namely discrimination on the grounds of political opinion, social origin, national extraction and race, as well as dissemination of information to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in employment, women workers, etc. Among the various information provided the most important, in their view, as far as the work of this Committee was concerned was the formation of a Council for National Minorities having four objectives, in particular the preparation of draft legislation aimed at eliminating the various cases of discrimination referred to by the Committee of Experts. They requested the Government representative for confirmation in this regard. They also requested the Government representative to inform this Committee about the progress made by this Council and when draft legislation could be expected to be adopted. Referring to some five different requests for information made by the Committee of Experts, they urged the Government to provide replies on those points so as to enable that Committee to assess Romania's compliance with this Convention.

The Workers' members agreed with the Committee of Experts that the discussion of this case should be pursued in the context of the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry regarding this Convention. They noted that the premises of these recommendations had guided to a large extent the legislative changes recently adopted in Romania. In fact, the report of the Commission of Inquiry had indicated the essential prerequisites for the transformation of an autocratic State to one governed by the rule of law. The Workers' members were, however, of the opinion that it was particularly necessary to apply these recommendations in practice, as indicated by the Committee of Experts on many previous occasions. They further emphasized the need to implement the prohibitions of direct or indirect discrimination based on ethnic, political or other grounds, in view of the fact that in practice discriminatory attitudes were still often encountered despite the efforts of the Government. The Workers' members drew the Government's attention to the need to take measures to compensate victims of discrimination. They regretted the fact that they did not have information regarding the situation of women and therefore supported the request of the Committee of Experts addressed to the Government to supply such information. While noting the progress made since the report of the Commission of Inquiry, the Workers' members considered that decisive government action was necessary so as to ensure compliance with the Convention by the Government, enterprises, authorities responsible for the judicial system and all institutions of the country, and this with respect to every individual. They urged the Government to take the necessary measures and provide detailed information in this respect.

The Workers' member of Romania shared the concern expressed by the Committee of Experts which stressed the need to take the necessary measures to eliminate certain practices inherited from the previous regime which gave rise to doubts about the functioning of an impartial system of justice. The recommendations of the 1991 Commission of Inquiry were still relevant today. He also stated that the laws drafted since 1991 with regard to collective agreements and the settlement of disputes had only partially succeeded in creating real social dialogue in both public and mixed enterprises. Many cases of discrimination were still encountered, in particular in enterprises where the situation was marked by a management with inherited management practices. Moreover, in some enterprises collective agreements were implemented in a discriminatory way with respect to the members of the various trade unions by favouring, in particular, house unions over independent ones. In some enterprises managed by technocrats of the old regime, members of independent trade unions and women were dismissed before all others. Even though workers who were victims of such dismissals could have recourse to the law, the time such procedures took and the lack of impartiality on the part of the tribunals made this option infrequent.

The Government representative stated that he had taken due note of the various statements made. He recalled that his Government had adopted a very important law on labour and social security matters. He acknowledged that there was still a discrepancy between the law and current practice. He further stated that all the measures taken by his Government took into account the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative, in particular those relating to the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry established to examine the complaint made under Article 26 of the ILO Constitution. The Committee noted with interest the measures taken to eliminate discrimination in employment and in training based on political opinion, religion, race, sex, national extraction and social origin. The Committee trusted that the Government's next report would contain the other information requested by the Committee of Experts so that, at one of its future sessions, this Committee could take note of the energetic measures taken by the Government and the progress made in law and in practice so as to ensure the full application of the Convention. The Committee trusted that the recommendations of the 1991 Commission of Inquiry would be fully applied in the near future and that both the Committee of Experts and this Committee would be in a position to note real progress in this matter.

Saudi Arabia (ratification: 1978). A Government representative stated, with respect in particular to the first point of the observation of the Committee of Experts that the provisions of the Islamic law (the Shariah) constituted the highest law and were the source of all the legislation. They constituted the written Constitution which called for equality in all areas of life without any discrimination on any grounds. The principles were promulgated in particular in the educational curricula and through mass media means.

Concerning section 160 of the Labour Code, referred to by the Committee of Experts in the second point of its observation, the Government representative stated that non-mixing of men and women in the workplace did not have any incidence on the rules concerning equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation, because in the conditions of employment and in the choice of occupation this non-mixing of men and women arose only after the recruitment. The women were admitted to occupations that were in conformity with their nature. All occupations were open to them, but the employers were required to ensure that men and women did not actually work together in the workplace. It was a linguistic or semantic problem which made the Committee of Experts state that the choice was being made for women rather than by women. This measure was inspired by the current Islamic traditions aimed at protecting the honour and virtue of women. The repeal of this provision was out of the question. He thought that it would not be appropriate to apply the same rules and points of view to his country, which had a Constitution founded on Islamic law, as to the countries founded on positive law. It would be appreciated if a member of the Committee of Experts would have qualifications in Islamic law. Concerning the third point on equality in the area of vocational training, he recalled that the law of 1988 clearly stated that equality in employment was important. The Committee of Experts, however, had misinterpreted the Government's reply on this matter. The Government had supplied information on the vocational training. Concerning the points 4 and 5, he stated that the list of dangerous occupations could be supplied only after it had been adopted. Concerning the professions of doctors and judges, there was no institute for the training of doctors and this was learnt on the job. In relation to statistics referred to by the Committee of Experts, he stated that his Government considered it necessary that account be taken of the fact that, in his country, women were not obliged to work because the Shariah set out the obligation on the head of the family to provide for the needs of the spouse and the family.

The Workers' members noted the appeal made by the Government representative for dialogue in this Committee, but queried whether this would be possible if the Government continued to reply, each time there was a query as to the application of the Convention, that the measures were in conformity with Islamic law. Nor did a criticism of the Committee of Experts for not having an expert in Islamic law really help the Government's case, as the Committee's job was simply to know the Conventions and to examine any laws which might affect their application. Furthermore, they recalled that a member of the Committee of Experts was from Kuwait. Article 3 of the Convention required not only that the legislation be in conformity with the Convention, but also that the Government promote educational programmes designed to secure the acceptance of a national policy of equality of opportunity and treatment. In Saudi Arabia, however, there existed certain provisions which jeopardize such equality. For example, section 160 of the Labour Code provided that "in no case may men and women co-mingle in the place of employment". A law which prevented men and women from working together was likely to imply a measure of inequality. Yet, the Government representative had indicated that this provision could not be repealed because it was in conformity with Islamic law and had repeated that women should only occupy jobs which suited their nature and were not contrary to the traditions of the country. The Workers' members stressed that, in accordance with the Convention, women should have the right to take up any type of employment. The situation in Saudi Arabia appeared to restrict women from such opportunities. Despite the cultural and religious arguments put forward by the Government, there was no doubt that the above provision led, in practice, to discrimination against women in employment. As concerned vocational training, women could only receive training in the occupational activities which would interest them most as wives and mothers. The training made available to women, therefore, was in the areas of nursing, the health sector, sewing and teaching. The Workers' members referred to the 1988 General Survey on Equality in Employment and Occupation of the Committee of Experts which indicated that archaic and stereotyped concepts with regard to the roles of men and women were at the origin of types of discrimination based on sex and occupational segregation according to sex which led to the concentration of men and women in different occupations and sectors of activity. They recalled that, in order to understand fully the situation in the country, the Committee of Experts had requested the Government to provide statistics on the number of women having access to training for the occupations of doctor and magistrate, but noted that such statistics had not yet been made available. They expressed concern at the circular logic of the Government which restricted itself to arguing simply that Islamic law was applied and did not permit discrimination. The Committee of Experts, however, had concluded, after examining the legislation, that certain provisions were in conflict with the Convention. The Workers' members recalled that the Government had ratified this Convention of its own free will and they urged the Government to supply practical information to the Office so as to support its claim that there was indeed equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women.

The Employers' members noted that the major difficulty in this case was the fact that the Government took the position that the Convention should be compatible with Islamic law and not vice versa. The Government representative had also declared that there was no discrimination in his country. Yet, in contrast, the Labour Code contained a provision whereby men and women were not permitted to be together in the place of employment. They considered that this case was quite urgent since the measures concerning vocational training and employment were clearly discriminatory. It was difficult to have a dialogue when the viewpoints were so vastly different. Yet the Government had voluntarily ratified the Convention and thus assumed its obligations. They, therefore, expressed the hope that the Government would take the necessary measures so as to eliminate the discrepancies in the application of the Convention.

The Workers' member of Greece noted that the problems raised in this case were both of a legal and a philosophical nature. With respect to the legal points, it was very clear from the comments of the Committee of Experts that the provisions of the Convention were not applied. As concerned the philosophical aspect of the problem, he queried whether the Koran actually provided that only men could decide what women should do. He stressed that, as had been said before in this Committee, one could believe in one God without having to discriminate against others.

The Committee took due note of the fact that, according to the Government, Islamic law (Shariah) respected full equality of treatment and opportunity. The Committee also noted that the Government was of the opinion that section 160 of the Labour Code, which prohibited work involving co-mingling of men and women, did not violate the Convention since the application of the Convention should be viewed from the standpoint of Islamic law, as well as the culture of the country; that as concerned activities which were dangerous for women, draft legislation had already been prepared and a copy would be supplied; and that in Saudi Arabia, women did not need to work, being in a position to devote themselves to their families. The Committee was of the opinion that the Convention should be applied regardless of the religion which prevailed in a particular country. The Committee also recalled that one member of the Committee of Experts was a national of Kuwait and that in other countries where Islamic law (Shariah) was applied this did not prevent application of the Convention. The Committee pointed out that, with regard to article 160 of the Labour Code, it was not a question of men mingling with women but of permitting women to have access to workplaces where men were also working, in a situation where there was equality of opportunity. As concerned vocational training, the Committee considered that women should have the same opportunities as men in order that women would not be excluded, de facto, from certain occupations. The Committee asked the Government to supply the information requested by the Committee of Experts in order to show that, both in law and in practice, equality of opportunity and treatment existed between men and women as required by this Convention, voluntarily ratified by Saudi Arabia. Finally, the Committee urged the Government to put into practice the willingness for dialogue, which was the tradition of this Committee.

Convention No. 118: Equality of Treatment (Social Security), 1930

Central African Republic (ratification: 1964). A Government representative stated that during the discussion of this case in 1992 his Government had declared itself ready to make the necessary changes in the legislation, and contacts had been established for this aim with the ILO Department on Social Security. Notwithstanding the social upheavals preventing the proper functioning of the administration, the Government was actively preparing the draft texts. It was not known, however, when these texts could be submitted to Parliament, dissolved a year ago, with elections scheduled for 17 October 1993. The Government would like to benefit from the ILO technical assistance in the elaboration of the necessary amendments. Referring to the difficulties encountered in the application of the Convention stemming from the fact that neighbouring countries had not accepted obligations under branch (g), he indicated that the Government was seeking to conclude reciprocity agreements even if the Convention in providing reciprocity was self-sufficient in this respect. When more countries would accept obligations of the Convention for branch (g), there would be fewer problems of application for his country.

The Employers' members recalled that the Committee of Experts had been making its comments since 1968, and that this case had been already discussed in this Committee in 1991 and in 1992. Referring to the Committee of Experts' observation concerning benefits to be paid in case of residence abroad, under Article 4, branch (g) and Article 5, branch (d) of the Convention, they took note of the general intention of the Government to respect its obligations and of the contacts pursued with a view to obtaining technical assistance from the Office. In relation to the dissolution of the Parliament, the Employers inquired whether certain modifications could be made by way of the administrative decisions, as the Government should respect its obligations.

The Workers' members supported the statement of the Employers' group. Noting the information given by the Government, they considered that it should provide further information on the concrete problems mentioned in the observation of the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' member of Senegal considered that this problem concerned taking into account the demands of workers in the context of migration at the level of the continent. The framework of negotiations between States to that end existed, but there was often a lack of political will on the part of the governments.

The Workers' member of the Central African Republic stated that since the beginning of the year the troubles had calmed down, the people had resumed work and the Labour Department functioned properly. He asked whether the report requested by the Committee of Experts had been communicated by the Government.

The Government representative repeated his statement according to which the provisions would be adapted in line with the request of the Committee of Experts. The ILO assistance would permit acceleration of this process.

The Committee took note of the information submitted by the Government to the effect that the situation remained virtually unchanged since the case was last discussed in 1992. The Committee also took note of the fact that, according to the Government, everything depended on the new Parliament resuming its work and that the Government would favourably accept technical assistance from the Office to develop the final version of the legislation. The Committee also noted the difficulties faced by the Government stemming from the fact that neighbouring countries had not ratified the Convention, which was based on reciprocity. The Committee hoped that the Office would be able to provide the technical assistance requested, and that the Committee of Experts and the Committee would be able to note progress when examining the next report to be submitted by the Government.

Iraq (ratification: 1978). A Government representative indicated that the comments of the Committee of Experts had not reached the Government and had been received only upon arrival at the Conference. He stated that section 38 of the Workers' Pension and Social Security Law No. 39 of 1971 guaranteed Iraqis as well as Arabs and foreigners covered by this provision, living abroad, the receipt of invalidity, old-age and accident benefits in accordance with the following: for Iraqis, the benefits were paid if they had left the country legally; nationals of other Arab countries received these benefits after the end of their service in Iraq or after their death, if their heirs did not reside in Iraq; for non-Arab foreigners, benefits were payable on a basis of reciprocity with their countries of origin. He believed that these regulations did not constitute restrictions on benefits and were not at variance with the provisions of the Convention. However, the Government would endeavour to find solutions. Problems were related to lack of foreign currency earnings because of the economic embargo.

The Employers' members, recalling that the Government had failed to report and that the Committee of Experts' comments had been known to the Government for a long time, stated that they could not accept the excuse given by the Government representative of not receiving the comments in time. The restrictions placed on social security benefits for Iraqi nationals living abroad, as well as for persons of other nationalities, under the corresponding legislation of 1971 and 1978 were not in conformity with the Convention. The Government's statement did not clarify the situation and was contradictory as the Government considered legislation to be in conformity with the Convention while stressing that certain efforts were necessary to resolve the question. In view of the large number of persons who had left Iraq in the course of 1990 this question was not just theoretical but had a great practical significance. As concerned difficulties created by the embargo, the Employers' members considered that these issues were not relevant to the Convention. Since the Government had long failed to react to the comments of the Committee of Experts, they insisted that in the near future a detailed report be supplied for examination by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' members supported the comments made by the Employers' members. Law No. 39 of 1971 and Instruction No. 2 of 1978 were not in conformity with the Convention and the Government should look again at the texts. The problem of the protection and the provision of pensions to foreign nationals living abroad was closely related to wages of foreign nationals under Convention No. 95, the application of which had been discussed by the Committee in 1992. Last year the Government representative had stated that they were entering into bilateral arrangements with some countries to deal with the problem of wages. The Workers' members considered that similar bilateral arrangements could, perhaps, be concluded with other countries in respect of pensions as well. They asked the Government to look at the possibility of inter-country relationships in order that pensions earned both by Iraqi citizens and foreign workers be paid to them promptly, in accordance with the Convention. The Government should study the matter again and provide the necessary information to the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' member of Kuwait, referring to the Government's statement in relation to the economic embargo, stated that no benefits and pensions had been paid to Egyptian workers who worked in Iraq since 1988 when there had been no blockade. As mentioned by the Employers' members, the Government's declaration was contradictory.

The Workers' member of Greece asked whether the Government was disposed to conform with the requirements of the Convention and to pay the arrears due to foreign workers who had left Iraq. In the name also of the Workers' members of Spain and Italy, he suggested that the Government of Iraq could formulate a request to release the funds blocked under embargo measures, so as to pay the pensions to workers who might depend on them for their survival.

The Government representative repeated that there was no contradiction between the legislation of 1971 and the provisions of the Convention. The conditions imposed by the law were simply intended to regulate the system. However, the Government was anxious to be in conformity with the Convention and would be studying the provisions of its legislation to see whether it could be brought into even better conformity with the Convention. As concerned benefits paid to workers who had left Iraq following 1990, this matter had been discussed in 1992 and, after studying the claim put forward by the Confederation of Egyptian Workers, the Government had stated that it was prepared to export petroleum in reimbursement of the international obligations it had towards those workers. There was a serious determination on the part of the Government to pay all that was due to these Egyptian workers. There were more than a quarter of a million in the country at present and all their rights were protected under the legislation. Benefits would be paid after the blockade was lifted.

The Workers' member of Greece stated that foreign workers who had left Iraq were not responsible for the war or its consequences and should not be held hostage of the situation, and that the Government should do everything to pay these workers.

The Government representative repeated that all economic transactions were now made impossible.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative and regretted that the report due had not been provided in order to verify the application of Article 5 of the Convention, under which payment was to be made abroad of certain benefits to nationals of countries that had accepted the obligations of the Convention, as well as to Iraqi nationals who had left the country. The Committee trusted that the Government would urgently submit the appropriate information so as to enable the Committee of Experts and this Committee to verify that Iraq fully complied with this basic provision of the Convention.

Convention No. 119: Guarding of Machinery Convention, 1963

Central African Republic (ratification: 1964). A Government representative pointed out that the legislative texts provided for the establishment of the medical labour inspection entrusted with the supervision of questions related to the guarding of machinery, hygiene and safety at work. This inspection was not, however, capable of functioning in practice, due to the lack of personnel and equipment resources. After the death of the sole medical labour inspector, its functioning was ensured by one senior health technician and one chief of the Safety and Health Service, who collaborated with the Social Security Department by providing advice and preparing the minutes of proceedings. The Government had asked the Office for assistance with a view to providing training of a general medical practitioner in the work health service, and the equipment necessary for the functioning of the health inspection. He also indicated that the Committee on Safety and Health at Work did not have the means to function.

The Workers' members recalled that this case had been examined by the Committee of Experts for a number of years, and had been discussed in this Committee in 1991. No report had been communicated for the examination by the Committee of Experts. The Government had referred to administrative difficulties, but in the discussion in 1991 the Government representative had indicated that texts had been prepared and submitted to the competent authorities for adoption. The Workers as well as the Employers had expressed their preoccupation with the long delay in settling the problem, in view of the importance of the application of the Convention for the safety and health and for the life of the workers. They insisted that the Government take the necessary measures to settle the problem, and communicate a report on the application of the Convention in due time.

The Employers' members supported the statement of the Workers' members. Referring to the previous statements of the Government, according to which the designation of the dangerous machinery or parts of machinery could be done in a decree, they considered that this designation could be done by an administrative decision and did not require the participation of a medical practitioner.

The Workers' member of the Central African Republic stated that numerous decrees had been adopted and that the list of dangerous machinery could also be adopted through a decree. In the absence of this list, he referred to the difficulties encountered by the forest workers as well as by the workers in pottery plants to prove their requests or complaints in case of accident. The Committee should insist that the Government adopt a decree and provide its text.

The Government representative stated that the Government would re-examine the question to determine at what stage of procedure the text actually was.

The Committee took due note of the oral information provided by the Government representative, and recalled that this case had been the subject of comments by the Committee of Experts for more than 15 years and had been discussed eight times by the Conference Committee between 1978 and 1993. The Committee regretted to take note with concern of this situation, as well as of the administrative and financial difficulties mentioned by the Government. The Committee also took note of the contacts established by the Government with the Office in view to provide training of a specialist in industrial medicine. The Committee once again observed that no progress had been made in the application of this Convention vital for the safety, health and life of workers. The Committee urged the Government to take without delay the necessary measures so as to implement the provisions of the Convention and thus ensure the protection of the physical integrity of workers afforded by this Convention. The Committee hoped that the Government would soon supply the report requested and that the Committee of Experts and the Committee would be able to take note of real progress in the near future.

Convention No. 122: Employment Policy, 1964

New Zealand ratification: 1965). A Government representative reiterated her Government's commitment to generating sustainable employment opportunities. In her view, the best way to do this was to create and maintain an economic environment conducive to sustainable economic growth. The thrust of the Government's economic policy had been to improve the international competitiveness of New Zealand firms as a means of creating new and sustainable jobs for New Zealanders. There was strong evidence, acknowledged by international commentators, that this export-led economic recovery policy was working. Despite the inevitable lags before the full benefits of such reforms were seen on the labour market, New Zealand could now report an aggregate employment growth of almost 1 per cent in the last 12 months up to March 1993 and that full-time employment had grown by 2.3 per cent over the year. After peaking in December 1991, the number of unemployed had fallen by 8 per cent. The unemployment rate now stood at 9.9 per cent, down from its peak of 10.8 per cent in December 1991, approximately the median of OECD countries. The high incidence of unemployment amongst some ethnic groups, the young and the under-qualified continued to cause concern, as did the growth in the number of people who had been unemployed for six months or more who were considered to be the long-term unemployed. To address the needs of these groups, the Government had developed a broad range of active labour market initiatives targeted particularly at these groups with a view to increasing their likelihood of gaining access to employment through work experience projects, employment subsidies for the long-term unemployed and through the implementation of a cohesive strategy designed to facilitate appropriate skill development for all New Zealanders. With regard to monitoring measures to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment (Article 2 of the Convention), referred to by the Committee of Experts, the Department of Labour closely monitored both the general labour market situation and the effectiveness and appropriateness of the active labour market policies established to assist in achieving these goals.

With regard to the Committee of Experts' concern at the lack of formal consultation machinery between the Government and representatives of employers and workers, the situation varied according to the nature and structure of the policy initiatives at the time. The Government initiated discussions with both employers' and workers' organizations on a variety of different matters of mutual interest. By way of example of such consultations, she cited the case of the "Enterprise Council", a small informal advisory body established by the Government and convened by the Prime Minister, composed of members from a wide range of sectoral interests including the business community, educational institutions and unions, chosen in their individual capacity based on the contribution they were able to make. The Council met regularly, about every two months. One early matter discussed was the question of employment and employment policy discussed by the Council in May 1992. A second example concerned the Government's Community Task Force Programme, which provided work experience for disadvantaged jobseekers. Delegations from the Council of Trade Unions and the Employers' Federation were consulted and their concerns addressed. A third example was the development of possible changes to the criteria for the Taskforce Green programme, which provided paid work experience to disadvantaged jobseekers. Employers' and union groups were specifically consulted, as a result of which one proposal was dropped and a second new proposal introduced. A further example was the Community Employment Group of the Department of Labour, which operated in a consultative manner with community organizations, including local workers' and employers' organizations so as to facilitate the development of local employment and enterprise opportunities.

In the area of training, the Ministers of Labour and of Education recently commissioned a consultative committee, chaired by the chairman of the Education and Training Support Agency and having members from the Employers' Federation and the Council of Trade Unions to report on the possible blockages to the achievement of the Government's Industry Skills Training Strategy and to seek means of overcoming them. The majority of the recommendations made by the committee were considered and acted on. In addition, the Ministers of Employment and of Labour met from time to time with representatives of the New Zealand Employers' Federation and the Council of Trade Unions to discuss matters of mutual interest. In conclusion, the Government had consulted, and would continue to consult, on a regular basis with the employer and employee organizations and others who were affected by the policy changes, but it would take the final decisions.

The Workers' members had learnt from the information given by the Government that in the last few months unemployment had gone down slightly in New Zealand. Nevertheless, the employment situation had deteriorated in the last few years as was pointed out by the Report of the Committee of Experts. The Experts stressed that unemployment had reached 9 per cent of the population and affected particular categories of people such as the young and ethnic minorities. In this respect, the distribution of unemployment among the various groups of people and the risk of marginalization or exclusion of some of these groups was creating concern. The Experts also emphasized the growth of involuntary part-time work. In light of the gravity of the situation and despite the Government's declared adherence to the goal of full employment, unemployment continued to be the country's main problem. The Workers' members expressed their doubts about the Government's real commitment to the goal of full employment and to the Convention. The Convention did not allow for employment to be considered as one of many adjustment variables, yet in New Zealand unemployment seemed to be seen as an inevitable cost of adjustment. Moreover, the goals of the Convention applied not only to the ministers responsible for employment agencies and vocational training, but also to those responsible for employment, labour, economic and budgetary matters, as well as to those responsible for monetary policies and to the Government as a whole. The Workers' members considered that this should not mean that the budgetary problems faced by a given country could be ignored. However, a policy that resulted in directly or indirectly marginalizing a category of the population and affecting its weaker elements was not in reality in conformity with the Convention's basic objective of attaining social justice through the right to work. The Workers' members expressed their doubts as to whether the Government was doing what was required to attain this prime objective of the Convention.

Regarding tripartite consultations, the Report of the Committee of Experts seemed to indicate that social dialogue and tripartism were disappearing throughout the different levels of society. In their view, this was the worst possible obstacle that might arise in the application of Article 3 of the Convention, as cited in paragraph 57 of the Report of the Committee of Experts. The Experts also made comments on the Employment Contracts Act No. 22 of 7 May 1991 which abolished the existing machinery for national consultation. The Workers' members considered that there is was a very big difference between possibilities or occasions for having some contacts and the existence of machinery that ensured that real consultations and structured social dialogue take place as required by Article 3 of the Convention. In light of the 1991 legislation abolishing such a possibility, the Government should have established more effective procedures if it considered the pre-1991 machinery to be have been unsatisfactory. The Workers and the Employers had expressed their support in the general discussion for the Experts' views on the importance of consultation and of tripartism. According to the Workers' members, broad social dialogue was a prerequisite to an effective employment policy or even vital for successful structural adjustments. They noted, however, that it was in regard to this last point that difficulties persisted.

The Employers' members recalled that the Experts had been making comments on this case since 1983, but that it was the first time that this Committee was discussing this case. They further recalled the importance of the Convention as it involved jobs, but noted that it was also a very generally-worded Convention setting out important employment policy goals. In reality, there was probably not one policy prescription that would solve all the issues concerned in all countries because of the varying circumstances involved. When this Convention first came into force in 1966, the prevailing economic philosophy was strongly linked to fiscal and monetary policies. Since the 1970s, the world had become a more competitive place and New Zealand, like many other countries, had undergone a substantial amount of structural adjustment to accommodate these rapid changes and suffered unfortunate consequences for disadvantaged individuals with the least amount of formal education and technical training, and requiring particular attention. Today, specially targeted approaches for the benefit of disadvantaged workers, such as skill development schemes, were more likely either to bring individuals into the workforce or to lead to the creation of jobs and reducing unemployment. New Zealand was attempting to do this and seemed successful to some extent. Notwithstanding the comments of the Committee of Experts, these policies were at least moving in the right direction. It was evident that measures to control inflation had the unfortunate consequence of increasing unemployment, at least temporarily, and particularly when compounded by complications of structural adjustment. The Employers' members hoped that more efforts would be made by the Government in this regard.

Turning to the issue of consultations, they thought that Article 3 of the Convention's emphasis regarding consultation concerned not only consultation with workers' and employers' organizations — as was the case with most other ILO instruments — but also with other groups such as disadvantaged groups and community-based groups. It seemed to them that New Zealand was moving more in the direction of meeting the requirements of the Convention, while at the same time not neglecting consultations with employers' and workers' organizations. The problem the Government faced in seeking job creation and dealing with issues of competitiveness, inflation and unemployment were not easy. The Employers' members expressed the firm hope that the Government would continue its efforts in this regard and would soon fully comply with the Convention.

The Workers' member of New Zealand stated that even though his Government had for many years been pursuing firm monetary and fiscal policies aimed at reducing inflation and the public debt accompanied by major structural reforms, the current unemployment rates were particularly high and between June 1990 and June 1992 attained an increase of 36 per cent. Although there had been some minor but positive changes in recent months, official statistics revealed that there were 2,000 jobs less than two years ago, a reduction of 3,300 full-time jobs by November 1992 and 40,400 jobs less in the last two years. These statistics were consistent with the comments of the Committee of Experts according to which involuntary part-time work had increased. The number of people of working age out of work or not actively looking for work had increased dramatically. The speaker expressed concern at the hidden unemployment which he considered a growing indicator of despair, alienation and family dependency, particularly as the greatest increase in unemployment was among young people and Maori and Pacific Islanders. The New Zealand Council of Trade Unions (NZCTU) shared the views of the Committee of Experts that the Government's priority was the control of inflation and that its commitment to the goals of the Convention was ambiguous. The speaker stated that the legislation governing the Central Bank stipulated that the Bank's sole objective was the achievement of low inflation. There was no mention of employment as an objective, as would be appropriate if it were truly a major goal of the Government as required by the Convention. The Government considered rising unemployment to be an inevitable cost in the short term of its economic adjustment strategy. In this respect, he underlined the interpretive comments of the Committee of Experts according to which employment as simply one of many adjustment variables would be decidedly against the spirit of the Convention. He also considered that the employment programmes cited in the Report of the Committee of Experts and described by the Government representative were insignificant when compared with the macro-economic measures which the Government could reasonably be expected to have in place if it were really pursuing full employment as a goal. The Experts considered that the pursuit of employment policies was indispensable in order to safeguard the fundamental rights of workers as set out in international labour standards and that unemployment had discriminatory side effects, entailed the degradation of employment and working conditions, threatened the free choice of employment and might affect the full exercise of freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining. He stated that these were the effects being experienced in New Zealand. Social welfare payments had been reduced by up to 25 per cent and unemployment benefits were withheld for six months if the worker refused a job offer, left a job voluntarily or was dismissed for misconduct. The Employment Contracts Act of 1991 deregulated the labour market and, inter alia, enabled employers to alter contracts of employment unilaterally, including the reduction of wages and allowances. All these measures seriously undermined workers' security, dignity, freedom to choose and to bargain collectively which were the subject of a complaint pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association, and further eroded the concept of freely chosen employment guaranteed by the Convention.

As regards consulations required by Article 3 of the Convention, the Committee of Experts stressed that consultation with representatives of persons affected was a fundamental obligation on the Government, as was the enlistment of their cooperation in implementing such policies. No such consultation took place in New Zealand. He considered that Article 3's terms clearly contemplated structured tripartite consultation. The Prime Minister's Enterprise Council referred to by the Government representative was not only limited to one worker representative among many employer and government representatives, but was not established as a tripartite consultative structure as envisaged by Article 3. The consultation, to the extent that there was any, was on an informal and ad hoc basis as described by the Government representative. In fact, in passing the Employment Contracts Act into law, the Government repealed the 1987 Act which had specifically provided for tripartite consultation and thus removed formal recognition of trade unions. Unions were not mentioned in the Employment Contracts Act and were now registered as incorporated societies in the same way as sports clubs. Finally, the speaker considered that, by the policies pursued linked with some social measures, the Government had consciously created unprecedented levels of unemployment and used unemployed workers as a tool in its economic policy without any real regard to the consequences in human terms. The NZCTU supported the call made to this Committee by the Workers' members for it to formulate firm conclusions requiring the Government to report next year on the implementation of the provisions of the Convention.

The Workers' member of Japan recalled that the Committee of Experts had examined this case for the last ten years and regretted the deterioration in the situation year after year and the fact that effective measures had not been taken by the Government, despite the recommendations of the Experts. He also noted that some administrative and legislative measures had been taken for the purpose of destroying free trade unions. He further noted the glaring contradictions between the information supplied by the Government representative and the conclusions of the Committee of Experts. He drew the attention of this Committee and that of the Government representative to Article 3 of the Convention, which not only provided for consultations with the social partners and other interested groups in the formulation of employment policies, but also for such consultations to take place during their implementation. These two elements seemed to be absent in the case of New Zealand. He stressed the need for this Committee to urge the Government to take the necessary measures to apply this Article of the Convention fully.

The Workers' member of Canada supported the statement made by the Workers' member of New Zealand regarding the preoccupying situation in the country. He considered the situation to be similar to that which still persisted in several other industrialized countries. As pointed out by the Experts, long-term unemployment had increased, some segments of the population such as women and youth were particularly affected and there was an increase in involuntary part-time work at the expense of full-time employment. Given the fact that the Government considered the increase in unemployment to be an inevitable cost at least in the short term of its structural adjustment policy, he wondered what was meant by "short term" in this context. He considered that the Committee of Experts was correct in once again drawing the Government's attention to Article 2 of the Convention which required the Government to decide on and keep under review within the framework of a coordinated economic and social policy the measures to be adopted for the attainment of the major goal of productive and freely chosen employment.

The Workers' member of India criticized the Government for not consulting the workers' organizations before adopting laws or taking other measures. He regretted that many governments did the same with respect to the reporting obligations to the ILO.

The Employers' member of New Zealand considered that employment was undoubtedly an essential concern of the Government, the workers and the employers. With a view to reducing unemployment, it was necessary to pursue a policy of economic growth. He stated that the Government actively pursued such a policy. He confirmed that various measures to increase employment had been taken. As regards tripartite consultations at different levels, he supported the statements of the Government representative and stated that he himself took part in such tripartite consultations in February 1993 on the implementation of Conventions, during which a formula for continuing consultation was agreed upon and at which all groups expressed their views. He added that the sustained policy of the Government and the consultations with the social partners had produced clear results and that the Convention was applied in reality.

The Government representative of New Zealand firmly rejected the statement of the Workers' member of New Zealand according to which the Government only fought against inflation. On the contrary, had the Government not fought inflation, unemployment would have been higher today. The emphasis placed on the fight against inflation was only one of the elements of the Government's policy for increasing employment. She was of the view that among the wide options available to governments in adopting and pursuing policies for employment, her Government had opted for a set of choices of measurably higher quality, when compared to those of other OECD countries. While she acknowledged that some aspects of the consultation machinery emphasized the formal side and related to wage fixing, the diversity of the means of consultation were, in her view, an appropriate response to the requirements of the Convention. Finally, she reiterated her Government's commitment to implementing the Convention.

The Workers' members shared the views of the Committee of Experts which in their opinion had been strengthened by the information supplied by the Workers' member of New Zealand. As regards Article 3 of the Convention, they noted that there were no real consultations with the workers and requested this Committee to support the two requests made by the Committee of Experts to the Government, namely to supply information on a complete assessment of the measures taken, and on the regular consultation procedures.

The Employers' members considered that the discussion showed that in dealing with the Convention there was hardly a perfect world nor perfect solutions to problems. They requested this Committee to include in its conclusions the point that one could not have job growth without economic development. As regards tripartite consultations, they supported the views of the Workers' members, but preferred the conclusions not to mention that there had not been consultations with the social partners in New Zealand because the facts were not clear on this point. The Employers' members were of the view therefore that this Committee should request further information in order to resolve the facts regarding consultations.

The Committee noted with interest the detailed discussion and was pleased to have had the opportunity to discuss the implementation of the Convention on employment policy in New Zealand. It appreciated the Government's efforts to provide detailed information on the measures adopted in the labour market as part of its applied economic strategy, as well as various other measures implemented. Although the Government was successful with regard to inflation, the public debt and economic competitiveness, it was concerned about the increase in unemployment and about the seriousness of the resulting social problems. Unemployment had doubled since 1988 and despite the improvements in the last few months it still affected 10 per cent of the active population. The Committee hoped that the Government would take into account the comments of the Committee of Experts on the need regularly to review as part of its economic and social policies the measures that should be adopted to promote the goals of the Convention. The Committee, while stressing the importance of social dialogue as indicated by the Committee of Experts, requested the Government to make every effort to give full effect to the provisions of the Convention regarding consultation and cooperation with workers' and employers' organizations and other interested parties in relation to employment policy. It also expressed the hope that it would be able to note progress in the next report.

United Kingdom (ratification: 1966). A Government representative referred to the Government policies for encouraging the growth of employment and for reducing unemployment and to the arrangements in place for consultation. He stated that the Government was firmly committed to pursuing policies which would encourage economic growth and generate sustainable employment. Key elements of this policy were low inflation and elimination of unnecessary regulations. The clear evidence from previous economic cycles showed, however, that during a period of recession special initiatives to increase or maintain employment in particular sectors would be successful, if at all, only in the very short term. Nevertheless, his Government accepted that in order to promote employment it had an important part to play in raising the levels of skills of the workforce and helping the unemployed back to work. A number of initiatives were taken to that end throughout the country. In addition, active labour market measures specifically designed for the unemployed were developed. Besides the normal placement services offered by the Employment Service, the Government would be offering unemployed people almost 1.5 million employment and training opportunities in 1993, which represented the most comprehensive range of help and advice ever made available with a view to improving the quality of opportunities. New measures would introduce 100,000 new opportunities mainly targeted at the needs of the long-term unemployed at a cost of 230 million pounds sterling. He stated that the Government did have, as a major goal, through the policies and programmes mentioned, the achievement of full, productive and freely chosen employment, and therefore was complying fully with the requirement of Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Full compliance with the Convention was, however, no guarantee that the policies applied would succeed: developments in employment depended on a variety of complex factors over which States had little direct control. While there were first signs of a recovery in the economy as testified by statistics, it was still too early to assess the strength of this recovery. The Government believed, however, that the conditions were firmly in place for sustained, non-inflationary growth and for improvement in the employment situation.

Responding to the Experts' comments concerning the serious difficulties encountered in establishing tripartite consultations on employment policy measures required by Article 3 of the Convention, he stated that the test of compliance with this provision could not be that full agreement be always achieved. With many interest groups to consult, the Government was bound to be faced with differing views and tripartism did not mean unanimity. While reduction of unemployment and promotion of full employment remained paramount objectives for the Government and both the social partners, there was a continuing difference of viewpoint between the Government and one of the social partners on the way to achieve this. There was a rich diversity of consultative arrangements to seek the views and cooperation of the social partners as well as other interest groups in the employment field, and these arrangements were well used. Both at the national and at the local level there were permanent bodies established on a tripartite basis or representing an even wider range of interests in the employment field. The tripartite Advisory Conciliation and Arbitration Service – an independent statutory body – dealt with industrial relations and their implications for employment patterns, terms and conditions. As regards the health and safety aspects of employment policies, the Health and Safety Commission was the national body representing the interests of the social partners, local authorities and the public at large. It supervised the work of the civil servants in the Health and Safety Executive. Both these bodies were of long standing and had a well deserved international reputation in their respective fields. As regards vocational education and training, much of the implementation of government policy and expenditures at local level were channelled through 82 Training and Enterprise Councils in England and Wales and 21 Local Enterprise Councils in Scotland. These councils included representatives of employers and workers, as well as of other organizations involved, such as local education and voluntary agencies. In the United Kingdom, the institutional arrangements for consultation were constantly reviewed and changed to meet the needs of the current circumstances. Thus, while the Advisory Conciliation and Arbitration Service had been kept, the tripartite Area Manpower Boards had been replaced by the Training Enterprise Councils which now were directly responsible for developing programmes to meet local needs. In the case of the National Economic Development Council, the Government took the view, after consultation, that it no longer reflected the realities of the British economy in the 1990s and that the Government no longer needed to use a separate body of this kind to consult the social partners or other interest groups on issues of economic or industrial policy. Instead, the Government relied on more direct consultative arrangements between particular government departments and industry. It was not the consultation that ceased, but its form. Besides the institutional arrangements, there existed also recognized procedures for consultation in particular areas of policy. The dissemination of publications known as Green or White Papers to employers' and workers' organizations and other interest groups provided the Government with a well accepted means of detailed assessment of its legislative proposals and policy initiatives. At senior level the social partners had access to government ministers. Efforts were also made to seek directly the views of individual unemployed people who usually had no organization to represent them as a basis of developing the Employment Service and measures specifically designed for the unemployed. In this respect a Job-Seekers' Charter set out the standards to achieve, assessed by the Employment Service, through the local customer satisfaction surveys. He concluded by stating that these examples illustrated the variety of ways in which the Government consulted its social partners and other interested groups on issues which affected them in the employment field. The Government believed that this complex of consultative methods, ranging from formal institutional structures and procedures to informal and ad hoc arrangements for particular issues, met the requirements of Article 3 of the Convention fully and flexibly, and should reassure the Committee that there was no basis for concern about consultative arrangements on employment matters in the United Kingdom.

The Workers' members recalled that they considered this Convention to be a priority Convention, coming immediately after the Conventions concerning fundamental human rights since the pursuit of employment objectives was indispensable to the safeguard of human rights. They noted that some people considered this Convention as merely a promotional one, and therefore less important than other Conventions. They recalled, however, that, in the general part of its report, the Committee of Experts had emphasized, on the contrary, the importance of this Convention. They stressed that the Convention imposed two obligations: the pursuit, as a major goal, of an active policy designed to promote full employment; and the obligation, under Article 3, to consult equally workers' and employers' organizations with a view to taking fully into account their experience and views and securing their full cooperation in formulating and enlisting support for such policies. They noted that the Government had not provided on this occasion all of the typical excuses for non-application of this Convention: recession; the control of inflation as a primary objective; the need to get rid of unnecessary regulation; the need to render the nation and its workforce competitive; and finally, the need to flow with the free market and not interfere with its movement by imposing social objectives. The Government had apparently ignored the prime objectives of the Convention: (1) the formulation and implementation of an active policy to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment; and (2) the obligation to decide on and keep under review, within the framework of a coordinated economic and social policy, the measures for obtaining these objectives. They pointed out that unemployment in the United Kingdom was not entirely due to recession, but rather it had been estimated that two-thirds of unemployment was due to economic restructuring. This latter cause precisely demonstrated the failure to apply policies aimed at promoting employment as a major goal. A great deal of unemployment was also due to the destructive search for zero inflation. While one could not argue that the search for low inflation was undesirable, it should not be done at the expense of completely destroying the economy; yet, in this case, this was precisely what was being done. This was demonstrated by the statement made by the former Chancellor of the Exchequer that high unemployment was a price worth paying for low inflation. They noted that there was a general tendency with the philosophy presently applied in the United Kingdom to eliminate any labour standards, including taking measures to place restrictions on trade unions, in order to render the workforce "competitive". Yet even while reducing the conditions of employment, the country still had the highest long-term unemployment in its history. They queried whether the numerous employment policies adopted over the decade were designed to assist the unemployed or rather to exclude them from the unemployment statistics.

As concerned consultation, which they intended to discuss in greater detail when looking at this Government's application of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), they noted that the Government had destroyed practically every tripartite organization in the country with the exception of the Manpower Services Commission and the Health and Safety Executive. As an indication of the Government's view of tripartism, they noted that the Minister of Trade had referred to tripartism as "the corporate state". They noted that, with the abolition of the National Economic Development Council (NEDC) – the only tripartite body where employment policy questions could be raised – without any replacement structure, there was no longer any dialogue at the national level where most of the economic policy decisions were taken. Informal or occasional consultations, including direct contacts with the unemployed, could not be considered as a framework for dialogue with respect to the formulation of employment policy. They concluded by expressing their dissatisfaction with the measures taken by the Government and noting that, even if fairly sustained economic growth was the aim for the rest of the year, unemployment would continue to rise in 1994.

The Employers' members indicated that they approached the matter of employment policy in a different way to the Workers' members. In their opinion, the Workers' members over-simplified the problem and put too much emphasis on short-term gains. They did note, however, that there seemed to be a difficult relationship between the social partners in this case. They stated that every country attempted to put in place employment policies designed to create good and productive jobs. Nevertheless, it was natural that, in any country, one or other of the social partners was bound to disagree with the policies taken. This Convention, however, did not establish a blueprint for creating jobs. No one particular policy would work in every situation. The Employers' members considered that economic development was the key to creating jobs. They stated that the characteristics of this case were very similar to those involving another country concerning this Convention discussed this year. They referred the Committee to those earlier comments which were equally applicable here. In this case, the Government was following active labour market policies, including education and training programmes designed to improve the job prospects of unemployed persons. The problems in this case were compounded by the fact that the Government was trying to fight inflation and deal with the difficulties of structural adjustment.

As concerned consultation, Article 3 of the Convention did not stipulate the type of consultation to be held or the level at which it should be held. The Government appeared to be trying a variety of approaches. Consultation was a two-way street, however, and required the best of will on all sides. The Government, worker and employer representatives should make every effort to ensure that the consultative machinery worked.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands drew attention to the strong wording in the Committee of Experts' comments concerning the need for consultation with representatives of employers and workers on employment policy with a view to taking fully into account their experience. He recalled that the Committee of Experts had indicated that it was not clear that the consultations in the area of training and on a series of complex technical subjects effectively met the requirements of Article 3 of the Convention. He noted that, contrary to the opinion of the Employers' members, Article 3 did establish a blueprint for involving workers and employers in the formulation and implementation of employment policies. He queried whether the alternative consultations referred to by the Government were really equivalent to bodies like the National Economic Development Council (NEDC). Since the Committee of Experts did not seem to be convinced that this was the case, he asked the Government to indicate whether it had been impressed by the concern raised in the comments and was willing to act upon the Committee of Experts' recommendations.

The Government member of Germany referred to the conclusions in the Committee of Experts which expressed the hope that the results obtained in fighting inflation, lowering interest rates and reinforcing economic competitiveness would ensure that the employment policy measures were successful and contributed effectively to improving the employment situation. He noted that this conclusion appeared to indicate that the Committee of Experts did not necessarily exclude the possibility that such measures would have a positive impact on employment. As concerned consultation, he noted that Article 3 of the Convention did not specify the type of consultative machinery which had to be instituted or that such consultations had to result in consensus. He did not feel that he was in a position to judge whether the machinery which replaced the NEDC was adequate, but was of the impression that the Government had indicated a readiness to consult with the social partners on employment policy.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands wished to stress that, while Article 3 of the Convention did not set forth a particular form of consultation, it could be understood to mean that governments, employers and workers played a full role with respect to employment policy. The indication given by the Government representative, however, left the impression that the Government was allocating a less important role to workers in this matter.

The Government representative welcomed the comments made by the Employers' members concerning the complexity of employment policies in the current circumstances and the complexity of consultative arrangements. It was not always possible to consult adequately through national bodies or even regional bodies. Sometimes it was necessary to consult at the local level or directly with the individuals concerned. He stressed that it was not the Government's position that macroeconomic policies were the only answer. But he also felt that a quick-fix for creating employment opportunities, particularly in a recession, did not exist. He noted that the Workers' members did not provide any advice as to a quick solution to the problem, nor did the Workers' members acknowledge the broader range of employment opportunities now available. It was obvious that the Workers' members and the Government had a difference of opinion as concerned the appropriate solutions. This difference existed despite the many communications with the social partners. The problem, therefore, did not concern the consultative machinery. As concerned the criticism made by the Workers' members concerning the numerous employment policies, he pointed out that this precisely demonstrated the Government's flexibility in adapting the policies in order to achieve the objectives. The Workers' members also seemed to reject flexibility with respect to the consultative arrangements. Yet Article 3 of the Convention was not limited to tripartism, but concerned consultation with anybody affected by employment measures and did not stipulate the form of that consultation. A flexible approach and a range of consultative machinery, in his opinion, demonstrated fuller compliance with Article 3.

The Committee took due note of the detailed information supplied by the Government representative. The Committee noted in particular the measures adopted and contemplated with a view to promoting vocational training and the placement of unemployed persons. The Committee considered that employment was of paramount importance to the workers concerned and that tripartite consultations were essential to deal with the problem of unemployment. It accordingly invited the Government to continue to take appropriate measures to give full effect to Article 3 of the Convention which required consultation and cooperation with representatives of the persons affected and, in particular, representatives of employers and workers on employment policy matters. In general terms, the Committee hoped that the next report would contain information showing, as requested by the Committee of Experts, that the measures taken under the growth strategy of the Government contributed towards improving the unemployment situation and promoting the objectives of the Convention.

Convention No. 128: Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Benefits, 1967

Switzerland (ratification: 1977). A Government representative stated that his Government in general accepted the comments of the Committee of Experts and that he would contest neither their substance nor their form. He specified that the two questions raised by the Committee of Experts in points 2 and 3 of its comments were pending in Parliament. Concerning the reduction of benefits in the case of serious and wilful misconduct, there was no longer any discrepancy, as regards the draft law currently under examination, between the requirements of the Convention and the proposed legislation, which should definitely regulate the question in due course. As to the lowering of the retirement age for certain categories of workers, his Government waited for Parliament to take up the relevant matter.

Another Government representative, technical adviser and representative of the Federal Office of Social Insurance, stressed, concerning point 2 of the Committee of Experts' comments, that the above-mentioned draft legislation, which the Government did not oppose, was before Parliament and had already been approved by one of the two Houses, the other having to do so before the end of this year. Concerning point 3 of the comments, she stated that in the framework of the second part of the tenth revision of the AVS, it was expected to permit men to anticipate by three years the possibility of receiving the old-age benefit, but with the reduction of 6.8 per cent for a year of anticipation. However, it was still premature for the Government to speak on this point because it was not certain that the project of the Federal Council would not be modified before its definite adoption by the Houses. Finally, concerning point 4 of the Committee of Experts' comments, she stated that the rate of 45 per cent prescribed by the Convention had already been passed and that account had been taken, as the Committee had suggested, not only of the benefits accorded by the general Old-Age and Survivors' Insurance Act, but also of benefits due under the Act on occupational insurance. However, it was the obligatory minimum provided by the latter that was calculated, although an important majority of the insured (86.8 per cent in 1987) were also covered by complementary benefits and only 1.3 per cent of the pensioners received the obligatory minimum.

The Employers' members appreciated the precise statements made by the Government representatives and were confident that the necessary measures would be taken in future and that the Committee would not need to come back to this case. As regards the possibility to fix women's retirement age at 64 years, which was denounced by the Swiss Federation of Trade Unions (USS), they considered it unnecessary to examine that question since the Experts had not specifically commented on this point.

The Workers' members also welcomed the information supplied by the Government and its acceptance of the remarks made by the Experts. They nevertheless stressed the fact that the problem of the application of the Convention had existed for several years and that, although this Committee was treating it for the first time, it had been the subject of direct requests in 1980 for the first time, and subsequently in 1981, 1983, 1985 and 1989. They found this unacceptable and considered it essential to advance toward the solution of the questions examined by the Committee of Experts. Concerning point 2 of the comments, the Workers' members stressed the fundamental character of the limitation of the workers' responsibility to wilful misconduct. Besides, they referred to a decision of 23 October 1985 of the Federal Tribunal on Insurance, which expressly recognized that Swiss legislation was not in conformity with the Convention. As to the lowering of the retirement age of persons engaged in arduous or unhealthy work, the Workers' members insisted that the Swiss Government should implement Article 15, paragraph 3, of the Convention because it concerned the matter of workers' dignity.

The Government representative stated that the Committee would be duly informed of the most recent developments on this matter since a detailed report would be submitted covering the period ending 30 June 1993. He observed that, in the same decision as mentioned above by the Workers' members, it was said that there was a problem of conformity between the Federal Invalidity Insurance Act and the Convention regarding the question of wilful and serious misconduct. The decision also stated that the Convention was not directly applicable in Switzerland, which meant that its application required changes of a juridical nature. Such changes could take time since it was for Parliament to decide after discussing the relevant draft law. He was nevertheless confident that Parliament would be able to retrieve the matter as a whole, which had been suspended, so as to treat the question of integration into the European Community and that legal texts necessary for the implementation of the Convention would enter into force in the shortest time possible.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representatives. The Committee noted that the Government agreed with the comments of the Committee of Experts and in particular that draft laws had been submitted to Parliament so as to bring the national legislation and practice into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention which had been the subject of comments by the Experts for several years.

The Committee hoped that the above-mentioned draft legislation would be adopted in the near future and that the Government would be able to supply information in this regard in its next report.

Convention No. 136: Benzene, 1971

Morocco (ratification: 1974). A Government representative stated that the current labour legislation contained a number of regulations on safety measures to be taken in the use of benzene and particularly on the protective equipment to be placed at the disposal of workers. The enterprises using benzene or products containing benzene were obliged to establish an autonomous industrial health service or to adhere to such a service created by several enterprises. The exposed workers were subjected to systematic and periodical medical supervision. The diseases provoked by benzene were considered to be occupational diseases giving a right to the corresponding benefits. To follow up on the comments of the Committee of Experts, a draft decree had been prepared to complete the legislation. It included the provisions of the Convention in all details. Its field of application covered all the establishments using benzene or products containing more than 1 per cent of benzene (Article 1). Any import of benzene was subjected to a previous declaration to the labour inspection (Article 2). The draft provided for the substitution of benzene by other inoffensive or less offensive products (Article 3). The use of benzene and of products containing more than 0.2 per cent of benzene as a solvent or diluent was prohibited (Article 4). The concentration of benzene in the air at places of employment should not exceed 80 mg/m^3 (Article 5). The draft specified methods to be used to determine the concentration of benzene in the atmosphere as well as technical and health measures of protection to be taken by the enterprises (Articles 6-15). Concerning the first point of the observation of the Committee of Experts on the consultation with occupational organizations, the Government representative indicated that the draft decree had not provided for this, because it excluded any possibility of derogation. This draft decree had, however, been communicated to the employers' and workers' organizations for comments. On the second point of the observation concerning the protection of workers exposed to contact with liquid benzene, he stated that section 8 of the draft decree replied to the question of the Committee of Experts as it provided, in particular, for adequate means of personal protection to be supplied and used by the workers concerned.

The Employers' members stated that the explanations provided by the Government on the comments made by the Committee of Experts concerning the application of Article 3 and Article 8, paragraph 1, of the Convention were not convincing. The problem was an old one having been discussed in 1988, and the Committee should urge the Government to adopt the modifications in the near future and to provide a report on the envisaged measures.

The Workers' members associated themselves with the intervention of the Employers' members. They noted that this technical, but extremely important Convention for the safety and even for the survival of the workers, had been ratified by Morocco as far back as 1974. During the discussion in this Committee in 1988, the Workers' and the Employers' members had underlined the importance of full application of the Convention. On that occasion, the Government had referred to a special section in the development plan for 1988-92 concerned with the improvement of working conditions and environment. The draft texts mentioned by the Government were incomplete as compared to the obligations under the Convention. The Workers' members considered the position of the Government to be more on the negative side, as proved by the comments of the Committee of Experts on the application of other Conventions, including, for example, Conventions Nos. 30, 52 and 81. In this connection, they considered that the Government should apply Convention No. 81 in practice, as well as in law. In view of the rather uncooperative attitude of the Government, they insisted that in its conclusions the Committee ask the Government to take the necessary measures in order to be able to note real progress next year.

The Workers' member of Greece considered that the Committee could discuss the application of the Convention not only in Morocco but also in respect of many other countries. International labour Conventions were the fruit of negotiations and of a compromise, and those protecting the health of workers introduced relative limits rather than absolute ones. As for benzene, which was widely used in all the products for painting, in petrol, in central heating oil, the limits for protection set by the Convention were not absolute, but still it was not respected, or the only measures taken were the creation of a medical service where the workers could apply to register any damage suffered. Prevention was even more important in this case as benzene was a carcigoneous agent. He asked the Government to indicate whether there had been any modification of the Labour Code or whether it had referred to a draft decree mentioned by the Committee of Experts.

The Government representative recalled that old legislation already contained all the necessary measures for the prevention and indemnification of occupational diseases in relation to benzene. A draft decree had been elaborated with the help of an ILO expert in cooperation with all the administrative departments of public health, industry, mines, etc. The national technical experts wanted to go even further beyond the protection provided by the Convention, considering that it was overtaken by the standards actually applied in certain countries. The Committee of Experts had based its comments exclusively on the declarations contained in the report and had not examined the text in question. As concerned consultations with organizations, it was obligatory under the Convention in case of derogations. The draft decree, however, did not allow any derogations and it was therefore not necessary to provide for the consultation with occupational organizations. As to the protective equipment provided to the workers against the risk of exposure to liquid benzene, it was addressed in section 8 of the draft decree. His Government attached great importance to the protection of the workers and was open to any suggestions susceptible to guarantee the health of workers to be included in the text of the decree. He would provide the text of the draft decree to the Office.

The Workers' members considered that the remarks of the Government representative were not convincing but that the Government could supply all the useful information to be examined by the Committee of Experts.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government, in particular that the Government had drawn up a draft decree with the aim of applying the Convention which had been ratified in 1974. The Committee deeply regretted having to note that this Convention had been the subject of numerous observations on the part of the Committee of Experts and of discussions in this Committee. It expressed the firm hope that the legislation aimed at applying the Convention would be adopted in the very near future, taking account of the comments of the Committee of Experts concerning this Convention whose non-application in practice had very serious consequences for the health of the workers concerned. The Committee hoped that it would be able to note decisive progress, both in legislation and in practice, at its meeting next year.

Convention No. 144: Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards), 1976

United Kingdom (ratification: 1977). A Government representative stated that his Government considered it regrettable that this case had been selected for discussion in this Committee. In light of the detailed procedure drawn up for the implementation of this Convention with the social partners in 1977, it was difficult to understand the allegations made by the Trades Union Congress (TUC). That written agreement established the basis of the practice which had remained unchanged over the years. Neither of the social partners had indicated to the Government that this procedure was no longer acceptable. If it was considered that there were genuine problems with the established procedure, then why did the TUC not approach the Government directly to explain its difficulties? The Government would have been more than willing to discuss the issues. As concerned the TUC's allegations with respect to consultation on article 22 reports, the Government indicated that all reports were sent to the social partners at exactly the same time as they were sent to the ILO. Given the respective geographical locations, the social partners were likely to receive the reports first. This procedure was in line with the 1977 agreement which determined that consultation would normally take place by correspondence. He emphasized the importance placed by his Government on its ILO obligations. The Government made a point of responding as fully as possible to the Committee of Experts' comments and any comments made by the social partners. The consultative procedure established had worked successfully over the last 15 years because it enabled the social partners to participate very effectively in the entire supervisory process and led to a fruitful and ongoing dialogue between the Government, the social partners and the supervisory bodies. While the Government was willing to discuss any difficulties with this procedure, he stressed that compliance with reporting obligations was a prime consideration. Unless reports were submitted to the ILO in reasonable time, the supervisory machinery simply could not function. He regretted the allegation that no effective consultations had been held with respect to the possible denunciation of the Migration for Employment (Revised) Convention, 1949 (No. 97). Not only were full consultations undertaken, but the views expressed by the social partners had a very obvious and direct effect on the outcome. The Government had written to the social partners in November 1991 concerning the possibility of denouncing Convention No. 97. Both social partners responded, questioning the necessity of denouncing this Convention. Following the suggestion of the TUC, the Government consulted the ILO. As a result of the technical advice provided by the Office, the Government concluded that denunciation would, after all, not be necessary and informed the social partners. This was clear evidence of the effectiveness of the consultative process. The process was begun as soon as the possibility of denunciation was envisaged, thereby ensuring that consultations could be carried out well in advance of any decision. The procedure was clearly not a mere formality and the events demonstrated that the employers and workers had a useful say and directly influenced the course of action adopted. He concluded by expressing the hope that, given the long-established practice of consultation on international labour standards, this Committee would agree that his Government had demonstrated, through its actions, its commitment to the application of the Convention.

The Workers' members recalled that, while consultation had a different connotation from mere "information" and from "co-determination", the Committee of Experts in its General Survey on this Convention pointed out that consultation should be able to have some influence on the decision to be taken. They granted the Government representative's point with respect to the effectiveness of the consultation concerning the possible denunciation, but noted that it was the only such example which could be offered. Tripartism should generate an internal debate, directly with the social partners. The procedure followed in the United Kingdom, however, was merely a formal one. This was evidenced by the fact that this issue was now being discussed by this Committee rather than by the concerned parties in their own country. All the previous methods of consultation had been dismantled. Consultation with the social partners should not be supplanted by the Citizen's Charter. The form of consultation did not have to be highly structured but some discussion had to take place. This had not been the case for years. Letters from the TUC to the Government often went without reply. They noted that it was in the Government's interest to discuss with the social partners, for example, legislation affecting the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87). Lack of consultation on such matters resulted in unnecessary discussion in this Committee. True, discussion need not necessarily affect the final decision, but at least discussions would have already been held and, if brought before this Committee, it would not be the first time for the parties to hear each other's views. Unfortunately, this was precisely the situation which had not taken place with respect to the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). The Government, however, seemed to be arguing that, since there would be disagreement, there was no point in discussing. On the positive side, the Workers' members welcomed the indication that the new Secretary of State for Employment had invited the Secretary of the TUC for a meeting. If this represented the first sign of a change in the Government's position, they were eager to embrace it. They did not insist that agreement should result from the consultations, but they urged that such consultations take place at the national level since that was where the Government made its decisions. They hoped that the promised meeting would signify a change and wished to encourage the Government to move in this direction. If, however, no progress could be noted, they considered that this case and all the other cases concerning the United Kingdom Government would have to be discussed at length in this Committee instead of eternally within the country between the Government and the new social partners.

The Employers' members highlighted the fact this was the first time that the application of this Convention by a particular country had been discussed in this Committee. They expressed the opinion that the discussion of this case was premature. They noted that the Workers' members had not mentioned the 1977 agreement concerning the procedure for implementing this Convention. Perhaps this discussion could have been avoided if the concerns had been raised first within the country. They recalled that the Convention called for effective consultations between representatives of government, workers and employers with respect to: replies to questionnaires, article 19 submission, article 22 reports, examination of unratified ILO Conventions and proposals for denunciation of ILO Conventions. Certain of these obligations were also set forth in articles 19 and 22 of the ILO Constitution and article 39 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. They were therefore applicable to all member States, regardless of whether the Convention had been ratified. They noted, however, that effective consultations required more than simply attaching worker and employer comments to government reports. Different facts and circumstances might require different procedures for consultation. Consultation could be made by telephone or by mail with respect to matters which were not controversial. On questions which might be more controversial, however, meetings prior to the Government's submission of reports to the ILO might be required. Without criticizing the 1977 agreement, they suggested that a new consultative procedure might need to be considered. They noted the Government's changes to the consultative procedures with respect to Convention No. 122 so as to meet the needs of current circumstances and suggested that this approach could be applicable within the context of this Convention and the five areas on which consultations were required. Regardless of their outcome, the consultations called for by this Convention could only enhance the quality of the Government's involvement in, and submissions to, the ILO.

The Government representative expressed his disappointment that the Workers' members did not comment on the procedure established in 1977 and that the workers in his country had not first expressed any difficulties which they might have had with this procedure directly to the Government. In reply to the comment made by the Employers' members, he indicated that his Government was perfectly prepared to consider changes if they were necessary, but stressed that the Government's capacity to send reports as close to the deadline as possible had to be safeguarded.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative. It recalled that the Committee of Experts had referred on a number of occasions in the past to the difficulty in establishing a constructive tripartite dialogue. The Committee stressed the importance it attached to the application in good faith of this Convention. The Committee hoped that the Government would re-examine the procedures with a view to ensuring that effective consultations take place regularly, within the meaning of the Convention, prior to, and within a reasonable period of time of, the preparation of the reports on the application of ratified Conventions, in particular when comments had been made about the Conventions concerned by the Committee of Experts. These remarks also applied to the denunciation of Conventions. The Committee hoped that the interested parties would be able to find, by means of a frank and open dialogue, the necessary ways and means of ensuring that the consultations provided for in this Convention took place in a manner satisfactory to all the parties concerned.

[2] As a result of a decision by the Governing Body, detailed reports were requested as from 1958-59 until 1976 only on certain ratified Conventions. [3] As a result of a decision by the Governing Body (November 1976), detailed reports are now requested, according to certain criteria, at yearly, two-yearly or four-yearly intervals.

II. OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING THE APPLICATION OF CONVENTIONS IN NON-METROPOLITAN TERRITORIES (ARTICLES 22 AND 35 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. General Observations and Information concerning certain Territories

(a) Failure to supply information in reply to comments made by the Committee of Experts

France (Guadeloupe, French Guiana, Martinique, Réunion, Saint Pierre and Miquelon.)

The Workers' members emphasized that the supply of information in response to comments made by the Committee of Experts was particularly vital, as such dialogue was indispensable for the work of the Committee. Although it was possible for the case of a country which failed to reply to be discussed in the Committee, often the Government in question would read out to the Committee a lengthy report that was impossible to understand on first hearing. On the other hand, if the Government had submitted it in the first place to the Committee of Experts, an assessment of the report could have been made prior to the case coming before the Committee for consideration. Member States who did not reply did not escape examination by the Committee, but instead hampered its work and made it more difficult to obtain an up-to-date assessment of the situation in question. They recognized that a large number of countries did reply generally to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, but hoped that the small group that did not do so would fulfil this obligation in the future.

The Employers' members noted that the high number of requests by the Committee of Experts for replies to its comments was the result of reports which had been submitted that contained major shortcomings, were incomplete or were insufficiently clear. They reiterated their appeal that member States should live up to their obligations in a more clear, punctual and complete fashion.

A Government representative of France, while indicating that his country could also have been mentioned for the omissions evoked under the preceding point, requested the Committee to excuse it for not having supplied within the desired time the replies to observations of the Committee of Experts. He stated that his Government was required to send at least 253 reports this year and that the omission, for which it was at fault, should not in any way be considered a change in attitude on its part towards the supervisory system of the ILO, but was simply attributable to an administrative lapse that he hoped the Committee would understand and which he was convinced would not recur.

The Committee took due note of the oral information provided by the Government representative of France. It stressed the importance for the preservation of the necessary dialogue and of the communication of clear and complete information in reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts. In this connection, it expressed its profound concern at the very high number of failures to reply to requests for information from the Committee of Experts. It recalled that the assistance of the Office may help governments to overcome some of the difficulties mentioned in the discussion. The Committee urged the Government of France (Guadeloupe, French Guiana, Martinique, Réunion, Saint Pierre and Miquelon) to spare no efforts so that the information requested would be communicated as soon as possible. The Committee decided to mention this case in the appropriate paragraph of its General Report.

(b) Information received

Netherlands (Aruba, Netherlands Antilles). Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent for Aruba the reports due on Conventions Nos. 9, 11, 69, 74, 87, 118, 122, 126, 131, 137, 141, 144 and 146, and for the Netherlands Antilles those due on Conventions Nos. 9, 11, 58, 87 and 122.

In addition, the Workers' member of the Netherlands stated that as a result of technical assistance the Government had provided to the Netherlands Antilles and to Aruba, these non-metropolitan territories would be submitting reports next year. He was confident that in the future reports would be filed without such assistance.

III. SUBMISSION TO THE COMPETENT AUTHORITIES OF THE CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS ADOPTED BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE (ARTICLE 19 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

Observations and Information

(a) Failure to submit

The Employers' members emphasized that the obligation to submit to competent national authorities the instruments adopted by the Conference was essential. They regretted that in the last few years failures and important delays in submissions had been observed. The report of the Committee of Experts only mentioned the serious cases of countries which, for at least the last seven years, had not provided information relating to the submission. The number of countries not meeting this obligation, however, continued to grow. The cases mentioned by the Committeee of Experts were particularly preoccupying, given the purpose of submitting such instruments to legislative authorities, i.e. parliaments, was to permit these bodies to acquaint themselves with the contents of these instruments in order to decide on their ratification and not neglect them. In this respect, the Employers' members emphasized the distinction that existed between the submission of an instrument adopted by the International Labour Conference to parliament from a proposal to parliament to ratify such an instrument that entailed the obligation of ratification by the parliament. The latter remained the prerogative of a State. The Employers' members therefore urged the States listed to rectify these failures without further delay. After such failures lasting for seven years, these countries probably needed the technical assistance of the ILO. They hoped that, in the future, such delays in submitting these instruments to the competent authorities would be avoided and the reports due supplied.

The Workers' members fully subscribed to the statements made by the Employers' members and the exemplary manner in which they described the important elements of reports regarding submission. They added that it was absolutely essential that the countries failing to supply the said reports should meet this obligation in order not to endanger the continuing dialogue. With regard to the explanations provided by the countries concerned, they acknowledged that often serious administrative problems existed. In this respect, the Employers' members had correctly pointed out that the technical assistance of the ILO should be sought regarding these cases.

A Government representative of the Congo explained that the delay in submission was due to the Parliament's failure to function normally. In fact, the country was over the last few years on the verge of civil war. Nevertheless, the Government had completed the technical analysis of these instruments and prepared and submitted its recommendations to Parliament. In the future, the country's institutions would be stabilized and the Government would be in a position to fulfil its obligations towards the ILO.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative of the Congo for his explanations regarding the problems of submissions in his country. They expressed their disappointment that no other government saw the need to provide any explanation. They hoped that a list of the concerned governments present in this Committee but not making statements and those that were not present would be made. The latter should be invited to make statements even if such statements were repetitions of previously provided information in order to assess such information. While recalling that the ILO was at the disposal of the countries concerned to provide them with technical assistance, they considered the failure of these countries to provide explanations to be an unfriendly act towards the ILO. They considered these countries should be mentioned in the appropriate paragraphs of the report of this Committee with a list of the countries that were and were not present in this Committee.

The Workers' members regretted that the Government representative of the Congo was the only one to speak, particularly when this Committee had adopted a new approach towards the examination of this question. This was the reason why they supported the request made by the Employers' members that the concerned countries should be requested to be present and make statements to enable them to understand the importance of supplying reports. In the absence of such reports, the whole supervisory system would disintegrate from the start. The countries that did not speak today should fully understand the importance of this obligation. They requested that these cases be cited in the paragraphs of the report of this Committee concerning the failure to submit.

A Government representative of Kenya stated that his Government had provided a written reply with regard to the problem of submission of instruments adopted by the International Labur Conference.

A Government representative of Bangladesh acknowledged that there were problems in his country in fulfilling the obligation to submit to the competent national authority instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference. The main reason was that submission to the Head of the Government was not considered to be sufficient by the supervisory bodies of the ILO. However, as of May 1992 such intruments were to be submitted to the Standing Committee on Labour Matters of the National Parliament. The need to officially translate into the national language these instruments was causing some delay in the process. He expressed the hope that they would complete this work in time for the Government to be able to report positively on this matter by 15 October 1993 along with other reports due.

The Committee took note of the oral statements made by the Government representatives of the Congo and Bangladesh, as well as of the oral and written explanations provided by the Government representative of Kenya. It further noted the specific difficulties encountered in fulfilling this obligation mentioned by several speakers. The Committee expressed the hope that the listed countries (Antigua and Barbuda, Bangladesh, Belize, Cambodia, Congo, Guyana, Jamaica, Kenya, Madagascar, Pakistan, Paraguay, Saint Lucia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone and Zaire) would, in the near future, provide reports containing information on submission of Conventions and Recommendations to competent authorities. This was a constitutional obligation which was indispensable to the effectiveness of the standards activity of the ILO. The Committee recalled the fact that the ILO could provide technical assistance in fulfilling this obligation. The Committee decided to mention these cases in an appropriate paragraph of its General Report.

(b) Information received

Kenya. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has supplied the following information:

The Government expressed its regret for not having been able to fulfil all its obligations under article 19 of the ILO Constitution. There were some delays in submitting several instruments to the national competent authorities, due to some unavoidable administrative and staffing difficulties, coupled with a general shortage of staff having the requisite knowledge and experience on the subject. As indicated during the Conference in 1992, all the necessary technical work had been completed for the submission of Conventions Nos. 154 to 169 as adopted from the 67th to the 76th Sessions. The Government had also embarked on the necessary technical preparation in respect of instruments adopted at the 77th and 78th Sessions. The Government would very soon be able to supply the ILO with all submission details pertaining to all the pending instruments.

Papua New Guinea. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has supplied information on the submission to the competent authorities of Conventions and Recommendations adopted between the 66th (1980) Session of the International Labour Conference, and its 76th (1988) Session.

Resolutions

REPORT OF THE RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE

1. The Resolutions Committee, set up by the Conference at its First Sitting on 2 June 1993, was originally composed of 126 voting members (54 Government members, 30 Employers' members and 42 Workers' members). An appropriate weighting system ensured equality of voting strength.

2. The first business of the Committee was to elect its officers. On the proposal of Mr. Bonneville (Government member, France), seconded by Mr. Rodríguez (Government member, Costa Rica), Mr. Mascia (Government member, Italy) was unanimously elected Chairman. In accordance with the Committee's usual practice, the Chairman was also appointed as Reporter. The Committee elected as Vice-Chairmen Mr. Castle (Employers' member, United Kingdom) and Mr. Tapiola (Workers' member, Finland).

3. The Committee had before it 15 resolutions submitted in accordance with article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. Fourteen of the resolutions were considered receivable in accordance with article 17, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders, but one of them gave rise to questions as to its receivability. The subsequent discussion, recorded in the special report of the Resolutions Committee on the Committee's Entitlement to Deal with the Resolution concerning the situation in Rwanda, concluded that the Committee might deal with the resolution, without setting any precedent. The Committee also agreed that the Office should change its practice in future and publish in such a case a draft resolution received within the time-limit laid down in article 1, paragraph 1(1), indicating in a footnote that the author's credentials had not yet been received.

4. The resolutions were then introduced by one of their authors in accordance with article 17, paragraph 5(a), of the Standing Orders and in the following order: (a) resolution concerning the commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization; (b) resolution concerning the need to review and update international labour standards; (c) resolution concerning the situation in Rwanda; (d) resolution on ILO action concerning indigenous and tribal peoples during the International Year for the World's Indigenous People; (e) resolution concerning the promotion of the capabilities of labour administrations and enhancement of the role of labour ministries in the development process; (f) resolution concerning the social dimension of structural adjustment and the transition to a market economy; (g) resolution concerning non-standard and precarious forms of employment; (h) resolution concerning the contribution of the ILO to social protection during periods of transition and structural adjustment; (i) resolution concerning social security; (j) resolution concerning the role of tripartism in the face of economic interdependence and the development of democracy; (k) resolution concerning the informal sector; (l) resolution concerning the contribution of the ILO to United Nations activities for the defence and promotion of human rights; (m) resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the elimination of child labour; (n) resolution concerning globalization, regional integration and international labour standards; and (o) resolution concerning the struggle against poverty, exclusion and marginalization.

5. After these presentations, and before the vote held in accordance with the procedure laid down in article 17, paragraph 5(a), of the Standing Orders, the following four resolutions were combined by their authors: the resolution concerning the social dimension of structural adjustment and the transition to a market economy, submitted by the Government delegations of France, Germany, Russian Federation and Ukraine; the resolution concerning the contribution of the ILO to social protection during periods of transition and structural adjustment, submitted by Mr. Avraam, Workers' delegate, Cyprus; and Mrs. Spychalska, Workers' delegate, Poland; the resolution concerning social security, submitted by Mr. Glesener, Workers' delegate, Luxembourg; Mr. Herrera, Workers' delegate, Costa Rica; Mr. Rabemanantsoa, Workers' delegate, Madagascar; and Mrs. Sietaram, Workers' delegate, Netherlands; and the resolution concerning the struggle against poverty, exclusion and marginalization, submitted by Ms. Aerenlund, Workers' delegate, Denmark; Mr. Bonmati, Workers' delegate, Spain; Mr. Brett, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Briesch, Workers' delegate, France; Mr. Bustos, Workers' delegate, Chile; Ms. Buverud Petersen, Workers' delegate, Norway; Mr. Eström, Workers' delegate, Sweden; Ms. Engelen Kefer, Workers' delegate, Germany; Ms. George, Workers' delegate, Australia; Mr. Gopal, Workers' delegate, India; Mr. Gray, Workers' delegate, United States; Mr. Itoh, Workers' delegate, Japan; Mr. Mugalla, Workers' delegate, Kenya; Mr. Sánchez Madariaga, Workers' delegate, Mexico; Mr. Tapiola, Workers' delegate, Finland; Mr. Vanni, Workers' delegate, Italy; and Mr. Verzetnitsch, Workers' delegate, Austria. The merged text, with which Mrs. Carr, the Worker member of Canada, whose credentials had been submitted late by her Government, associated herself, was entitled Resolution concerning social protection and the alleviation of unemployment and poverty, and the social dimension of structural adjustment and transition to a market economy.

6. In accordance with the procedure laid down in article 17, paragraph 5(a), of the Standing Orders of the Conference and using the traditional system of balloting, the Committee determined the first five resolutions to be considered among the 12 remaining before the Committee and their order of priority. Owing to a change in the composition of the Committee, there were at this time 157 voting members (75 Government members with 32 votes each; 32 Employers' members with 75 votes each; 50 Workers' members with 48 votes each).[1] The members of the Committee were invited to participate in a test of the electronic voting system, although its results had no legal value.

7. The first resolutions and the votes cast for them were as follows:

[1] Subsequently, further changes were made in composition: fourth sitting on 8 June 1993, 161 voting members (76 Government members, 32 Employers' members and 53 Workers' members); fifth sitting on 11 June 1993, 161 voting members (79 Government members, 30 Employers' members and 52 Workers' members); sixth sitting on 14 June 1993, 161 voting members (79 Government members, 30 Employers' members and 52 Workers' members); seventh sitting on 15 July 1993, 152 voting members (79 Government members, 29 Employers' members and 44 Workers' members); eighth sitting on 16 June 1993, 154 voting members (79 Government members, 29 Employers' members and 46 Workers' members); ninth sitting on 17 June 1993, 152 voting members (79 Government members, 29 Employers' members and 44 Workers' members).

(1) Social protection and the alleviation of unemployment and poverty, and the social dimension of structural adjustment and transition to a market economy: 19,939 (weighted votes).

(2) Commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the ILO: 15,602 (weighted votes).

(3) ILO contribution to United Nations activities for the defence and promotion of human rights: 12,199 (weighted votes).

(4) Need to review and update international labour standards: 12,141 (weighted votes).

(5) Role of the ILO in the elimination of child labour: 11,596 (weighted votes).

8. The Employers' Vice-Chairman remarked that he had been pleasantly surprised by the smooth operation of the secret ballot. He felt, however, that the delegates still needed help with the electronic voting procedure. He suggested that a further trial should be carried out in which delegates would vote simultaneously rather than consecutively and without assistance. The Workers' Vice-Chairman endorsed this view. The Government member of the United Kingdom indicated that more explanation of the procedure for the electronic voting system should be given.

9. In accordance with article 17, paragraph 5(b), of the Standing Orders, the Committee at its fourth sitting set up a Working Party to make recommendations as to the order in which the remaining resolutions before the Committee should be examined.

10. The Working Party was composed as follows:

Government members:	Mr. Melas (Austria); Mr. Qwabe (Swaziland); Mr. Koviazine (Ukraine).
Employers' members:	Mr. Canning (United States); Mr. El-Herrawi (Egypt); Mr. Huttunen (Finland).
Workers' members:	Mrs. Sietaram (Netherlands); Mr. Medor (Senegal); Mr. Zellhofer (United States).

11. At the Committee's eighth sitting, the Government member of Austria, Chairman of the Working Party, announced that the Working Party had met and determined the following order of priority:

(6) Situation in Rwanda.

(7) The informal sector.

(8) Role of tripartism in the face of economic interdependence and the development of democracy.

(9) ILO action on indigenous and tribal peoples during the International Year for the World's Indigenous People.

(10) Globalization, regional integration and international labour standards.

(11) Non-standard and precarious forms of employment.

(12) Promotion of the capabilities of labour administrations and the role of labour ministries in development.

The Committee noted this information.

12. The Employers' Vice-Chairman noted that, as the Resolutions Committee had not been able to progress to the discussion of more than four resolutions last year and would probably not be discussing more than two resolutions this year, it might not always be necessary to form the Working Party to make recommendations as to the order in which the remaining resolutions before the Committee should be examined. He requested the Governing Body to take this point into account when it came to look at the reforms proposed for the Resolutions Committee. He suggested that the Governing Body might want to propose changing the rules in order to give the Committee the option to set up such a Working Party rather than leaving it under an obligation to do so.

13. The Workers' Vice-Chairman took note of the views of the Employers' Vice-Chairman. He also recalled that the functioning of the Resolutions Committee would no doubt have to be discussed in the light of the experiences of the shorter International Labour Conference in 1994 and that, thereafter, the Governing Body should make an evaluation of the results. The Workers' group would be open to participating in such a discussion.

14. The Government member of the United Kingdom, speaking on behalf of several other Government members, agreed with the idea of examining the question at the appropriate stage and in the appropriate forum.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING SOCIAL PROTECTION AND THE ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND POVERTY, AND THE SOCIAL DIMENSION OF STRUCTURAL ADJUSTMENT AND TRANSITION TO A MARKET ECONOMY

Presentation of the four original texts

15. Each of the four resolutions which had been merged were presented by their authors as follows.

16. The Government member of the Russian Federation introduced, on behalf of all the co-authors, the resolution concerning the social dimension of structural adjustment and the transition to a market economy. He observed that many of the countries which had launched programmes of structural adjustment and transition to a market economy were facing a number of severe problems, such as hyperinflation, reduction in industrial output, unemployment and bankruptcies, which had resulted in a decrease in the standard of living. The success of such reform programmes would depend largely on reconciling economic reform with social protection. It was important that governments, with the active participation of the social partners, should adopt measures aimed at attenuating the negative consequences of these programmes, especially for the more vulnerable sections of society. The ILO could help in creating appropriate systems of social protection in the countries concerned and should reinforce its cooperation with the international financial institutions (e.g. IMF, World Bank, EBRD) in order that their programmes take into account the need for social protection. In addition, the ILO should take a leading role in the preparation, discussions and follow-up of the World Summit for Social Development.

17. In presenting the resolution concerning the contribution of the ILO to social protection during periods of transition and structural adjustment, the Workers' member of Poland underlined the particular needs of countries such as her own during the period of transition towards a market economy. The transitional period was characterized by high unemployment, extreme poverty, and reduced remuneration and social protection resulting in a deterioration of living conditions. Despite the charter of social rights already established in Poland, not everyone wished to take part in dialogue, even though tripartite dialogue was more effective than going on strike. Many countries, including developing ones, were undergoing structural adjustment and the specific proposals of the resolution would help counteract the resulting social and employment problems.

18. The Workers' member of Costa Rica, introducing the resolution concerning social security, referred to the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as well as the Declaration of Philadelphia regarding the right to social protection for all people. He recalled the narrow scope of application of social security schemes in developing countries, which often covered only workers earning wages. He also recalled that most of the population had no social protection, had poor sanitation leading to a high incidence of infant mortality and had no access to health care. Without political will, there was a risk that economic growth would not be accompanied by social development. Different criteria should apply according to whether or not people earned a wage. He therefore called on governments, employers and workers to apply international conventions relating to social security in order to ensure minimum levels of income as well as social protection schemes for all. These should be financed from public funds through traditional institutions such as workers' organizations, mutual-aid institutions and cooperatives, in order to establish social and health services, foster education and promote collective bargaining as well as employment. He called on the Governing Body to give special priority to social protection in the work programme of the ILO.

19. The Workers' member of Spain introduced the resolution concerning the struggle against poverty, exclusion and marginalization on behalf of the co-authors. Poverty was in his view a danger already identified as such by the Declaration of Philadelphia. No section of society should be excluded from the benefits of economic and social development. It was therefore highly auspicious that the Governing Body had approved the Director-General's proposal to make the elimination of poverty a priority for the ILO's work programme for 1994-95 and that the United Nations had decided to convene in 1995 a World Summit for Social Development. The fight against poverty was intimately linked with a policy of free choice of productive employment for all, as provided for by ILO standards. The universal and equal application of these standards was crucial in the prevention of poverty and exclusion. The resolution therefore appealed to the Governing Body to take various forms of action to solve the problems posed by poverty, exclusion and marginalization, in order to equilibrate the differences between North and South.

General discussion

20. The Workers' Vice-Chairman thanked his Worker and Government colleagues for their excellent work in the preparation of the merged text, and proceeded to describe the common denominator that had enabled them to merge the four texts. Using a musical analogy, he stressed the seriousness and importance of the present text, a classical resolution which he saw as an "étude" for the preparation of the 1995 World Summit for Social Development, covering as it did four main aspects of social protection - poverty and marginalization, structural adjustment, problems of transition to a market economy and concerns over high unemployment. The Workers' group was not wedded to particular sets of words and would be open to various suggestions for amendment so long as they were sensible and in tune with the rest of the text. What counted in particular was the reference to future ILO action in operative paragraph 2, and more particularly in subparagraphs 2(f) to (i). These clauses laid down the ILO's role in preparing for the World Summit for Social Development, as well as its priority programme on the elimination of poverty in the 1994-95 work programme. The Workers' group itself would refrain from proposing any amendments, and individual members of the group would also be encouraged to refrain from doing so.

21. Expressing her Government's support for the resolution, the Government member of the United States stated that the current high rates of unemployment, resulting in economic hardship and waste, were unacceptable. Policies should be introduced both to promote economic growth and employment and to assist those workers adversely affected by changing economic conditions. As Mr. Reich, Secretary of Labor, United States, had pointed out in his address to the plenary session of the Conference, the current recovery in the United States, as elsewhere, was not generating the job growth traditionally seen in periods of recovery. Unemployment remained at nearly 7 per cent, with almost 10 million unemployed and others underemployed or too discouraged to look for work. At the same time, the gap between high-wage and low-wage workers had been growing, and a large number of new jobs were part time. New programmes to help unemployed workers should strike a balance between the need to provide temporary income support and the need to provide the education, training, continuous retraining, employment services and incentives necessary for these workers to find new jobs with adequate incomes. She encouraged members of the Committee to support the resolution and to limit any amendments to form rather than substance.

22. The Employers' Vice-Chairman indicated that his group would not oppose the resolution and would be proposing only a limited number of amendments. Finding sufficient resources for the various forms of protection proposed by the resolution was the fundamental problem. In his Report, Social insurance and social protection, the Director-General had stated that the main constraints were the size of the formal sector and the size of the tax base, which depended upon the state of economic development. Throughout, the Report pointed to the need to create resources through growth. An amendment to the resolution would therefore be necessary to underline the need to promote growth in order to introduce or improve systems of social protection. Furthermore, the Director-General's Report stated that it was not possible for all member States to follow the same path of development and therefore social protection measures could not be uniformly imposed. Finally, he stated that, if the resolution could help the ILO gain greater influence at the 1995 World Summit for Social Development, the Employers' group would support it.

23. The Government member of Germany pointed out that two of the resolutions forming the basis of the merged text had concentrated on the alleviation of unemployment and the elimination of poverty, both having direct implications for the World Summit for Social Development, while the other two resolutions, one of which had been co-authored by his Government, stressed structural adjustment and the transition to a market economy. Merging the texts had given an even greater emphasis to the need for eliminating unemployment, which should be the primary aim of the World Summit for Social Development. A major problem of the present century would be resolved and society would have a greater solidity if poverty could be overcome and if marginalized groups could be integrated into society. The topics on which the World Summit for Social Development would reach conclusions were well reflected in the present resolution. The Governing Body had recently confirmed that the ILO had a major role to play in the World Summit for Social Development, and the present resolution would make an important contribution towards that objective, particularly because it took structural adjustment and transition to a market economy into account, and therefore was relevant to countries like his own, which was in part affected by these problems.

24. The Government member of the United Kingdom, indicating her Government's strong support for the resolution, stated that no one could deny the importance of the topics covered by it. They were of central interest to a large number of countries, to their governments, employers and workers, and thus to the ILO. While the text of the resolution originally submitted by the Governments of France, Germany, the Russian Federation and Ukraine would have been fully supported by her Government, she would be submitting a number of amendments on some of the wording of the longer and more complex merged text. While she had no difficulty with the general purpose of the present resolution, she issued a caution over the implied or explicit suggestion that the problems were uniform rather than highly differentiated, that social protection should precede and dominate economic growth, that there should be standards of employment before jobs had been created, that exclusion and marginalization were getting worse in all cases, that it was possible to protect societies completely from change, that compliance with specific standards that had not yet been ratified by all countries should be required, and that social protection was free from resource contraints.

25. The Government member of Algeria welcomed the priority that had been given to the resolution, as the most pressing problems of a large part of the world were in the social arena. Sustained and durable economic growth was essential for social development. In the South, macroeconomic factors such as declining terms of exchange, debt-servicing and disinvestment, had led to serious difficulties. The reduction in social services and disintegration of social protection mechanisms, together with the growth of unemployment, were the visible signs of the policies of structural adjustment applied by most developing countries in order to adapt to the laws of the market economy. It would be important to emphasize the need for international action in the operative paragraphs of the resolution. While there had been significant progress in democracy and human rights, economic and social sectors had remained on the sidelines. The struggle against the impoverishment of three-quarters of the world's population should be given top priority, as indicated by operative paragraphs 2(f) to (h) which underlined interdependence and interaction. The World Summit for Social Development would be an ideal forum for dealing with this issue. The ILO should put all its weight behind convincing the financial institutions to adopt a new philosophy in their programmes for economic reform in order to keep the social consequences for developing countries to a minimum.

26. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic believed that the resolution took up two very important issues: unemployment and poverty. These closely related problems, frequently the result of structural adjustment and transition to a market economy, should be tackled by all possible means. The ILO should assist the affected countries through technical cooperation. He supported the resolution and appealed to Committee members to amend it only to bring about improvements.

27. The Government member of the Sudan observed that many countries were still suffering from the same problem they had been facing in the 1950s and 1960s, namely poverty. Some had changed from a centralized to a market-oriented economy but without any real progress, and their people were feeling frustrated. Poverty was particularly widespread in rural areas. In the Sudan, the Government had set up many social programmes within its plan for 1990-93. Increased agricultural credit had improved the situation in the supply of food and water. The Government was obliged to meet an increasing debt-service burden and to face up to pressures on the balance of payments. Nevertheless, many local projects aimed at improving productivity in agriculture had shown very positive results. Employers and workers had cooperated in many of these projects. However, the speaker strongly advocated that social problems could not be solved without considerable external and internal financing. He proposed that one role of the ILO in this regard should be to better inform financing institutions on the problems of poverty and on their solutions, including providing them with the appropriate statistical basis for decisions.

28. The Government member of Japan expressed his support for various elements of the resolution and in particular operative paragraphs 1(d), 2(a) and 2(b). He also described some aspects of his country's experience of structural adjustment. He referred to the special measures taken through legislation adopted in 1959 when there had been a dramatic switch of energy source from coal to oil. These measures had included specific counselling, employment services in remote areas, paid retraining, promotion of housing to encourage employment in industrial regions, special public works programmes to provide temporary jobs and employment adjustment grants to employers. The 1959 law served as a model to cope with unemployment caused by structural change. He then described the inflationary effects of the first oil crisis during which the trade unions had exercised restraint in their wage demands in return for the application of price control policies by the Government. At that time, a "Round table conference on industry and labour" had made possible free and informal discussions which ensured the success of negotiations. The speaker also underlined the difficulties faced by older workers in finding new jobs during periods of change. In Japan, a new employment adjustment subsidy had been introduced to assist employers in depressed areas to maintain continuity of employment. He concluded by stressing the need for employment security, education and training, industrial safety and health, as well as prior consultations between the social partners. He reiterated his country's intention to play a positive role in the World Summit for Social Development and, calling on the ILO to make available to this Summit its expertise in the field of social development, expressed his support for operative paragraph 2(i) of the resolution.

29. The Government member of Nicaragua believed that the resolution should address the consequences of structural adjustment and stabilization programmes. The preamble should be more explicit in pointing out their consequences, some of which were extremely negative. As concerns the World Summit for Social Development in 1995, the resolution should exhort all governments to encourage the ILO to play an effective role in implementing, through the UNDP, programmes in such areas as training, productivity improvement and quality control, to alleviate the effects of structural adjustment. The ILO should not be transformed into a forum where social issues were only discussed. Rather, its role as executor of the social programmes of the United Nations should be reinforced. International labour standards and collective agreements, traditional pillars of the activities of the ILO, formed the basis of economic stability, but were now challenged by the structural adjustment process. As a result, tripartite dialogue had suffered. If the resolution was to be more coherent and effective, it was essential that the active role of the ILO be dealt with in more detail in the operative part. The resolution would contribute to preventing major conflict, for there could be no peace where there was poverty.

30. The Government member of Egypt remarked that the resolution was complex and involved a number of interrelated subjects which were all of interest to her country. In her view, the resolution, especially the preamble, could be shortened considerably. She believed that, in the present context, structural adjustment and transition to a market economy were different aspects of the same problem. The international dimension should also be considered in the resolution on account of the resulting economic constraints on the realization of comprehensive social protection schemes. The resolution should mention the specific national and regional needs to which social schemes should respond. The financial burden for these schemes should not only be shared between governments, employers and workers at national level but should also be the subject of partnership and shared responsibility at international level.

31. The Government member of China supported the resolution. Many countries were faced by severe problems due to structural adjustment and transition to a market economy. Unemployment and poverty had become widespread in many areas. The ILO should, in accordance with its mandate, assist countries to find solutions to the crisis.

32. The Government member of Austria also identified unemployment and poverty as major problems for most countries. His country therefore supported the resolution. He proposed, however, to modify the operative part of the resolution to include the concept of protection for minorities.

33. The Workers' Vice-Chairman thanked the Employers' group for their constructive attitude. His group was ready to consider any proposals to improve the resolution and he was therefore anxious to see the amendments which would be submitted.

Consideration of amendments

34. Seventy amendments, numbered from D.5 to D.74, were submitted for examination.

Amendments to the preamble

35. The Committee adopted the title and paragraphs 1 and 2 of the preamble of the resolution without amendment.

36. Amendment D.28, submitted by the Government members of Canada, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, sought to replace paragraph 3 by the following text:

> Stating that each member of society should have the right to social protection where needed,

37. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom pointed out that the resolution was about extending the basic social protection already mentioned in the Declaration of Philadelphia. This fundamental aim was laudable but it was not realistic to speak of "inalienable right" in many countries which faced insurmountable difficulties in implementing even a very basic system of social protection. Therefore the authors of the amendment wanted to propose a text which was closer to the text of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

38. Amendments D.8, submitted by the Employers' group, and D.52, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, also sought to remove the notion that social protection was an inalienable right. They were, more specifically, as follows:

- amendment D.8: delete in paragraph 3 the words "the right to" and replace the words "is an inalienable right of each" by the words "should be extended to every";
- amendment D.58: replace in paragraph 3 the words "the right to social protection is an inalienable right of" by the words "social protection is vital for".

39. The Employers' Vice-Chairman and the Government member of India, respectively introducing amendments D.8 and D.52, stated that they also believed that the words "inalienable right" should be replaced, since rights are established by Conventions and not by this Committee. In some countries, the extension of social protection depended very much on the socio-economic situation.

40. The Government member of Egypt also felt that it was not appropriate to call social protection an inalienable right.

41. The Government member of Sri Lanka, however, did not think that there was any need to amend the paragraph. The use of the word "inalienable" was only to emphasize the importance of social protection.

42. The Workers' Vice-Chairman said that if the word "inalienable" caused problems for the Employers and certain governments, he could suggest other alternatives. He proposed that the paragraph should read:

> Stating that social protection is a right which should be enjoyed by every member of society,

43. The Government members of the Czech Republic and the Russian Federation supported this proposal. Although several other Government members proposed alternative wording to replace the word "enjoyed", the majority of members favoured the proposal of the Workers' Vice-Chairman, which was adopted.

44. Amendment D.9, submitted by the Employers' group, proposed the insertion of a new paragraph 4 worded as follows:

> Noting the Report of the Director-General to the present session of the Conference, entitled Social insurance and social protection, which identifies joint prerequisites for the development of social protection programmes as "full employment, steady economic growth, the existence of functioning financial markets and institutions, stable and democratic political structures, good governance and administration and, above all, a social consensus which supports the redistribution of income",

45. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that the objective of this proposed paragraph was to refer to the prerequisites mentioned by the Director-General's Report and which appeared to be non-controversial.

46. The Workers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that the Director-General's Report indicated that "many of the joint prerequisites for their development have been absent" but did not actually say that the factors mentioned were "the joint prerequisites", as the amendment stated. He felt that the paragraph would be acceptable with the insertion of the word "including" after "programmes" instead of "as".

47. The Government member of the United Kingdom agreed that the mentioned prerequisites might not be the only ones.

48. The amendment as subamended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman was adopted.

49. Paragraph 4 was adopted without amendment.

50. Amendments D.43, submitted by the Government member of the Czech Republic, and seconded by the Government member of Austria, and D.53, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, both sought to delete paragraph 5.

51. The Government members of the Czech Republic and Egypt, introducing the amendments, said that they did not believe that the marginalization of urban and rural sectors was a fact in all countries. In any case, not the whole of those sectors were becoming marginalized and it was certainly not as a result of deliberate policies.

52. Their position was supported by the Government members of Algeria, Austria, Tunisia and the United Kingdom.

53. The Workers' Vice-Chairman stated that the paragraph could without great difficulty be improved on the basis of other proposed amendments if the governments concerned withdrew amendments D.43 and D.53.

54. The two amendments were put to a vote by a show of hands. There were 68,510 votes for and 65,400 votes against and 5,460 abstentions. The total number of votes exceeded the 73,944 needed for the quorum. The amendment was therefore accepted and paragraph 5 deleted.

55. As a result, amendments D.10, submitted by the Employers' group, and D.29 and D.30, both submitted by the Government members of the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, which addressed the same paragraph, all fell.

56. Amendment D.44, submitted by the Government member of the Czech Republic and seconded by the Goverment member of Egypt, and amendment D.54, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, sought to delete paragraph 6 of the preamble.

57. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the Czech Republic pointed out that paragraph 6 dealt with only one specific health-care problem in referring to "high disease rates among children" and wondered why this one example should be quoted if others were not.

58. The Government member of Tunisia declared that the principle of universality upon which preambular paragraphs should be based was lost by the reference to "some regions". His Government upheld the principle of universality and was against discriminatory, sectoral measures. Furthermore, it was the World Health Organization that was responsible for drawing up comprehensive health-care programmes wherever they were needed in the world, and not the ILO.

59. The Workers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that paragraph 6 in fact expanded paragraph 5 which the Committee had, unfortunately, just voted to delete. Consequently, it had to be reformulated. Deleting could lead to seriously distorting, or at least dismembering the resolution, when amending it was quite feasible. Rather than deleting paragraph 6 as well, and hence eliminating from the resolution not only marginalized groups in rural and urban sectors of society but also children, and perhaps references to other vulnerable groups such as women and the elderly, he proposed that the Committee should take a more constructive approach and, if the amendments under discussion were withdrawn, attempt to salvage some of the wording from the previous paragraph, which was acceptable to all, in a reformulated paragraph 6.

60. The Government member of Germany declared that health care, as a part of social protection, was for general application, but recommended deleting the more specific "in particular high disease rates among children".

61. The Government member of Egypt also queried why health care was mentioned when other forms of social protection were not.

62. The Government member of the United Kingdom indicated that, while health care was indeed covered by the WHO, it was also covered in part by the ILO, for example in respect of basic social security schemes providing health care in some developing countries.

63. After the Government member of Australia, seconded by the Government member of Sweden, had suggested that both the broader issue of social protection and the specific issue of health care should be retained, amendments D.44 and D.54 were withdrawn by their sponsors.

64. Amendment D.22, submitted by the Government members of Finland and Sweden, sought to insert the words "for women and children" after the words "limited access to health care".

65. Introducing amendment D.22, the Government member of Sweden invited the Committee to formulate a broader paragraph reflecting the preceding discussion.

66. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed the following subamendment:

> Considering the problems arising out of poverty, inadequate social security coverage and limited access to health care,

67. Amendment D.22, as subamended, was adopted.

68. Amendment D.55, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, sought to delete the word "high" and the words "pension schemes, and unemployment benefits," from preambular paragraph 7.

69. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of India explained that he had a problem with the definition of "high", which might vary according to different circumstances. Furthermore, "pension schemes" and "unemployment benefits" were included under "social protection" and did not need to be enumerated here.

70. The Workers' Vice-Chairman agreed that "high" could be deleted and, in response to the previous speaker's second point, proposed adding the word "including" before "pension schemes". The Government member of Tunisia found this subamendment acceptable.

71. The Government member of Germany expressed a preference for leaving "high" in the text, as only when unemployment was high were its negative effects perceivable.

72. The Government member of Tunisia found the inclusion of the word "high" inappropriate. Any form of unemployment had a negative effect, not just "high" unemployment. If the word was kept, however, more emphasis should be given to the negative effects.

73. The Employers' Vice-Chairman wished to retain the word "high" before "unemployment", but agreed to the addition of the word "including", as proposed by the Workers' Vice-Chairman.

74. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed the following subamendment to amendment D.55:

> Recognizing that high unemployment has a particularly adverse effect on social protection, including pension schemes and unemployment benefits,

75. Amendment D.55, as subamended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted.

76. Amendment D.31, submitted by the Government members of the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, sought to replace paragraph 8 by the following text:

> Convinced that economic efficiency, with adequate social protection, is a prerequisite for successful national development, and that economic reforms should also lead to sustainable social progress,

77. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the Netherlands indicated that it placed the emphasis squarely upon "economic efficiency", rather than on interdependence between economic efficiency and social protection.

78. The Employers' Vice-Chairman gave his full support to the amendment.

79. The Workers' Vice-Chairman stressed that the notion of interdependence was extremely important, and was a prerequisite for successful national development, whereas the amendment under consideration put social protection into second place, and made it dependent on the vague notion of economic efficiency.

80. The Government member of Algeria confirmed that the idea of interaction and interdependence should be retained in the paragraph.

81. The Employers' Vice-Chairman opposed the idea of interdependence, declaring that national development was not dependent upon social protection in any way, although it might eventually lead to an improvement in social protection.

82. The Government member of Tunisia referred to amendment D.56, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, but not yet under discussion, which sought to replace "efficiency" by "growth". In his view this idea corresponded more closely with actual circumstances.

83. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed the following subamendment to D.31:

> Convinced that economic efficiency and growth, and their interaction with adequate social protection, are imperative for successful national development, and that economic reforms should also lead to sustainable social progress,

This was supported by the Government members of Mexico and Argentina.

84. The Employers' Vice-Chairman proposed a further subamendment to the text above: the replacement of "imperative" by "important prerequisites".

85. Amendment D.31 as subamended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, and further subamended by the Employers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted, with some reservations on the part of the Government member of Germany.

86. As a result, amendment D.11, submitted by the Employers' group, and amendment D.56, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, which addressed the same paragraph, all fell.

87. Amendment D.57, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, sought to insert, after paragraph 8, the following new paragraph:

> Noting with concern the constraints faced particularly by developing countries such as an adverse economic environment, scarcity of resources that constitute a major impediment to full realization of a comprehensive social protection scheme,

88. Introducing the amendment, the Goverment member of Egypt referred once again to her intervention in the general discussion, where she had pointed out the bearing the international dimension had in such areas as terms of trade and the debt burden in the difficult environment of developing countries. These constituted "major impediments", and she therefore proposed rendering these words in the plural.

89. The Government member of Cuba supported the amendment.

90. Concerned about the overall balance of the resolution, with the deletions already adopted and the addition now proposed, the Workers' Vice-Chairman suggested introducing "and" before "scarcity", and a reference to "countries in transition" to take account of countries other than developing ones.

91. The Government member of Egypt pointed out that "particularly developing countries" did not exclude any other countries, even developed ones. She proposed that "scheme" could be replaced by "system".

92. The Employers' Vice-Chairman sought clarification on the difference between "scheme" and "system". A short discussion then followed on the wording of the three different language versions of the amendment.

93. The Government member of Namibia proposed to subamend the amendment by inserting "and limited resources" for ", and scarcity of resources" and "comprehensive" by "viable".

94. The Workers' Vice-Chairman further proposed "comprehensive and viable" instead of "viable".

95. Amendment D.57, as subamended, was adopted.

96. Amendment D.58, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, proposed the insertion of a new paragraph 10 as follows:

> Commending the strenuous efforts exercised by countries to implement structural adjustment programmes, and noting in this context the adverse effects those programmes have often entailed on social security,

97. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Egypt drew attention to the efforts made by countries within their structural adjustment programmes and suggested that a reference was needed in connection with the effects of these programmes on social protection. She suggested the insertion of "with concern" after "noting" to reflect the concern of governments.

98. The Workers' Vice-Chairman suggested that such a paragraph would be acceptable if subamended with the words "noting the efforts exercised by" and "regretting the effects".

99. The Employers' Vice-Chairman observed that not only developing countries had made such efforts but also countries in Eastern Europe and elsewhere. He believed the efforts of these countries should be recognized. However, he pointed out that not all programmes of structural adjustment had resulted in adverse effects on social security. Therefore, he suggested that "often" should be replaced by "in many cases" .

100. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed a further subamendment, as follows:

> Underlining the importance of the efforts exercised by countries implementing structural adjustment programmes, particularly developing countries, and regretting in this context the adverse effects those programmes have in many cases entailed for social protection,

101. Amendment D.58, as subamended, was adopted.

102. Amendment D.32, submitted by the Government members of Canada and the United Kingdom, proposed the replacement of the existing text by the following:

> Convinced also that the alleviation of poverty is closely linked to the need to promote full, freely chosen and productive employment and that the application of relevant international standards has an important contribution to make in this, particularly in helping disadvantaged groups,

103. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Canada stated that the authors of the amendment wished to remove the notion of automaticity in relation to the application of international standards. They also wished to remove some of the language which they considered over-dramatic or colourful. They believed that the words "achieved" and "to counter exclusion and marginalization" should be replaced respectively by "promote" and "helping disadvantaged groups".

104. The Workers' Vice-Chairman expressed serious concern that even the simple mention of international labour standards caused opposition among certain delegations. He agreed that "closely" could replace "intimately" while "promote" could be substituted for "achieve", but otherwise would like to keep the rest of the original text. He proposed that the last phrase of the paragraph could read "has an important contribution to make in countering exclusion and helping disadvantaged groups,".

105. The Employers' Vice-Chairman replied that "international labour standards" did not cause him any difficulties but their application was not automatic and was subject to the usual ratification procedures at national level. For various reasons many countries could not apply certain standards. He was therefore prepared to support the amendment. He also wished to know precisely which international labour standards would counter unemployment and exclusion.

106. The Government members of India, Tunisia and the United Kingdom also expressed their support for the amendment with the subamendments proposed by the Workers but wanted to know which international labour standards could counter unemployment and exclusion. Like the Employers' Vice-Chairman, they preferred that the word "relevant" be used in relation to the expression "international labour standards".

107. After some further discussion, the Committee decided to adopt the amendment as subamended as follows by the Workers' and Employers' Vice-Chairmen:

> Convinced also that the alleviation of poverty is closely linked to the need to promote full, freely chosen and productive employment and that the application of all relevant international labour standards has an important contribution to make in countering unemployment and exclusion, and helping disadvantaged groups,

108. As a result of the discussion, amendment D.59, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, and amendment D.12, submitted by the Employers' group, which addressed the same paragraph, all fell.

109. Amendment D.45, submitted by the Government member of the Czech Republic, and seconded by the Government member of Austria, sought to replace paragraph 10 of the preamble by the following:

> Noting the importance of dialogue and cooperation between governments and employers' and workers' organizations in establishing a suitable legal framework for social protection and in formulating and carrying out relevant policies,

110. The Government member of the Czech Republic explained that his amendment D.45, seconded by Austria, aimed at recognizing the influence of all the social partners in the establishment of social protection.

111. Since many delegations expressed a preference for the existing text, amendment D.45 was withdrawn by its author.

112. Amendment D.46, submitted by the Government member of the Czech Republic and seconded by the Government member of Austria, aimed at replacing in the text of paragraph 11 of the preamble the words "requires it to contribute" by the words "should contribute". It was adopted with a minor subamendment. The words "requires it to contribute" were replaced by "to contribute".

113. Amendment D.33, submitted by the Government member of the United Kingdom, sought to delete the words ", particularly in situations of structural adjustment" from paragraph 11, but was withdrawn since it was similar to that of the Employers' group.

114. Amendment D.13, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace, in paragraph 11, the word "particularly" by "and that its assistance would be especially useful".

115. Introducing this amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman said that he wanted to make it clear that the ILO's mandate did not call for the Organization's action in situations of structural adjustment but that any assistance provided by the Organization in these situations would be useful in connection with other aspects of its mandate.

116. This amendment was adopted after being subamended with the replacement of "especially" by "particularly" after a proposal of the Government member of Nicaragua and the Workers' Vice-Chairman.

117. Amendment D.14, submitted by the Employers' group and related to paragraph 12, proposed to replace the words "struggle against" by the words "alleviation of" in line with the wording used in the Director-General's Preface to the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95. It was adopted without discussion.

118. Paragraph 13 was adopted without discussion.

Amendments to the operative part

119. Amendment D.60, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, sought to replace the words "Calls on governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organizations:" by the words "Invites governments and employers' and workers' organizations:"

120. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Tunisia indicated that the aim of the co-authors was to show that the responsibility for the measures outlined in operative paragraph 1 should be shared by governments, employers and workers. While the term "calls on" might be appropriate if it was a Convention, and therefore a form of legislation, the term "invites" was more appropriate in a resolution.

121. The Workers' Vice-Chairman and the Employers' Vice-Chairman accepted the term "invites", but explained that "governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organizations" was standard wording for an ILO resolution and should remain, as some of the paragraphs in operative paragraph 1 were relevant only to governments. Indeed, the phrase "where appropriate" was used so that a distinction could be made between the responsibilities of governments and the social partners, where necessary.

122. The Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia stressed that the three social partners should be put on an equal basis in order to demonstrate the principle of their collective responsibility. This was not an attempt to implicate all the social partners in setting up the legislative framework but a means of illustrating their shared, but differentiated, responsibility.

123. On the suggestion of the Government member of the United Kingdom that the addition of "where appropriate" to amendment D.60 might be acceptable to the co-authors, the Government member of Egypt made a counter-proposal that they would accept "calls on" instead of "invites" if the members of the Committee wishing to add "where appropriate" withdrew their subamendment. She reiterated that the wording should not be such that it put too great a burden on governments, while letting employers and workers take a secondary role, particularly when new social protection schemes were under examination.

124. The Employers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that it was more relevant for the responsibilities of employers and workers to be referred to in specific paragraphs, as was already the case in paragraphs 1(d) and 1(g), where their participation was explicitly called upon. On the other hand, the introductory section of operative paragraph 1 was traditional and he, like the Workers' Vice-Chairman, saw no reason for changing it.

125. The Government member of Egypt proposed that the Committee should continue to discuss the rest of operative paragraph 1 before returning to the introductory section for a decision. However, the Committee rejected this proposal. After further interventions by the Government members of Denmark and Greece, each asking the co-authors of the amendment to accept the subamendment proposed by the Government member of the United Kingdom, the Government member of Tunisia stated that he and his co-authors would agree to this.

126. Amendment D.60, as subamended, was adopted.

127. Amendment D.61, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, sought to insert the word "particularly" after the word "dialogue" in operative paragraph 1(a).

128. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Tunisia pointed out that creating favourable conditions for social dialogue should be a permanent feature of industrial relations rather than a measure that should be taken only during a period of structural adjustment.

129. The Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairmen found the amendment acceptable. Amendment D.61 was adopted.

130. Amendment D.34, submitted by the Government member of the United KIngdom, and seconded by the Government member of Austria, sought to replace operative paragraph 1(b) by the following text:

> to carry out economic and structural reforms having regard to the interests of all sectors in the population, and taking measures to protect workers in so far as possible against the adverse effects of social change, including by establishing appropriate mechanisms for assisting those displaced by structural adjustment;

131. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom stated that the changes proposed were less radical than they appeared. Her intention had been not only to maintain the overall aim of the text but also to introduce a more realistic note. The reforms mentioned should be carried out but it would be difficult to protect all workers and every part of society from all adverse effects during the process of structural adjustment.

132. The Workers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that "social change" in the original text of operative paragraph 1(b) should have read "structural change", and that "affected" might be more appropriate than "displaced" in the last line. He proposed to subamend the text as follows:

> to ensure that economic and structural reforms are carried out with due regard to the interests of all sectors of the population, and measures are taken to protect workers against the adverse effects of structural change, including by establishing appropriate mechanisms for assisting those affected by structural adjustment;

133. The Government member of Tunisia, referring to amendment D.62 on the same paragraph, submitted by himself and the Government members of Egypt and India, stated that it sought to simplify the original text by deleting the last part, "by establishing effective mechanisms for assisting those displaced by structural adjustment", which simply repeated the first part of the text in different words.

134. The Employers' Vice-Chairman found the amendment, as proposed by the Government member of the United Kingdom and subamended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, acceptable, and proposed to subamend it further by adding "such as vocational training and skills development programmes" after the word "mechanisms".

135. The Government member of Nicaragua stated that the amendment would only be acceptable if it included an indication that the measures outlined in the paragraph should be carried out in relation to the degree of development in each country, as sometimes countries became the victims of the structural adjustment programmes they were obliged to apply. This point of view was supported by the Government member of Tunisia.

136. The Workers' Vice-Chairman found the previous speaker's proposal unacceptable, as it would imply establishing a principle of different levels of application. The words "where appropriate" allowed for differences that might arise in practice when a principle was being applied in different countries or groups of countries.

137. The Government member of the United Kingdom also expressed her concern over introducing into an ILO text the idea that countries at different levels of development should be able to apply measures in different ways. She suggested reinserting "in so far as possible" to take account of the problems expressed.

138. The Workers' Vice-Chairman suggested the wording "as effectively as possible" instead of "as far as possible".

139. The Government member of Nicaragua returned to his earlier point that reference should be made to the capability of a government to deal with problems in relation to the degree of the development of the country. The measures might be appropriate, but could they be implemented or not?

140. The Government member of Denmark noted that the Committee was embarking on a serious and difficult discussion which was not within its domain. The question of the interpretation of international labour standards or human rights according to the level of development would be discussed in other ILO fora as well as at the World Conference on Human Rights at Vienna and later in the General Assembly of the United Nations in New York. The idea of a double standard had no place in the text of an ILO resolution.

141. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, and the Government members of Ireland and Sweden supported the previous speaker's position and urged the Committee to follow the compromise proposed by the Government member of the United Kingdom.

142. The Government member of India refused to accept the position of some of the earlier speakers that the current discussion was not relevant and that certain topics did not fall within the purview of the discussion. He pointed out that what was being discussed was the text of the resolution and the discussion should not be restricted to labelling certain matters as irrelevant or not within the scope of the discussion. He supported the proposed compromise.

143. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed to replace "in so far as possible" by "to the extent possible". The text would then read:

> to ensure that economic and structural reforms are carried out with due regard to the interests of all sectors of the population, and measures are taken to protect workers to the extent possible against the > adverse effects of structural change, including by establishing appropriate mechanisms, such as vocational training and skills development programmes, for assisting those affected by structural adjustment;

144. Amendment D.34, as subamended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman and the Employers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted.

145. As a result, amendments D.15, submitted by the Employers' group, D.47, submitted by the Government member of the Czech Republic, and D.62, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, which addressed the same paragraph, all fell.

146. Amendment D.48, submitted by the Government member of the Czech Republic, and seconded by the Government member of Austria, sought to delete paragraph 1(c). On introducing the amendment, the author said that he had found the first and last parts of the paragraph inconsistent. However, he proposed to withdraw his amendment in order to allow further discussion.

147. Amendment D.35, submitted by the Government members of the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, sought to replace the words "to make the struggle against unemployment and poverty a principal goal" by the words "to make the fight against poverty and unemployment and the need to promote job growth principal goals".

148. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the Netherlands stated that the rewording reflected the earlier discussions on parts of the preamble, and gave expression to the idea that the promotion of job growth was a prerequisite for the fight against poverty to be successful.

149. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed replacing "job growth" by "job creation". This was widely supported by members of the Committee, and amendment D.35, as subamended, was adopted.

150. The Government member of Sweden withdrew amendment D.23, submitted by himself and the Government member of Finland.

151. Amendment D.16, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to make three amendments. However, the first and second points had fallen by virtue of the adoption of amendment D.35.

152. Introducing the third part of the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman drew attention to amendments D.36 and D.63, submitted by the Government member of the United Kingdom and the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, respectively. All three documents sought to delete the last part of the paragraph, "and avoid accentuating poverty, exclusion and marginalization", as it did not make sense in relation to the first part of the paragraph as it stood. The authors of the amendments, together with the Government members of the Netherlands, Nicaragua and Sweden, pointed out that there was no logic in the present ordering of ideas.

153. The Government member of the United Kingdom proposed to subamend the phrase by substituting "which reduce" for "avoid accentuating poverty".

154. Amendment D.16(iii), as subamended, was adopted.

155. Amendment D.17, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace operative paragraph 1(d) by the following text:

to develop, where appropriate, with the participation of workers' and employers' organizations, policies for economic growth and employment generation which will contribute to the strengthening of social protection systems, especially for the most vulnerable groups of the population;

156. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman declared that the aim of his group had been to make the paragraph more positive and 6urposeful, while maintaining most of its substance.

157. The Workers' Vice-Chairman suggested that it would be more sensible to place "as appropriate" further down in the paragraph, after "with the participation of workers' and employers' organizations", and to delete "will".

158. The Employers' Vice-Chairman accepted the first subamendment but wanted to retain the forward-looking "will" in the paragraph.

159. Amendment D.17, as subamended, was adopted.

160. As a result, amendment D.5, submitted by the Government member of Austria, fell.

161. Amendment D.49, submitted by the Government member of the Czech Republic, and seconded by the Government member of Austria, sought to replace the words "taking account of" by "taking into account" in operative paragraph 1(e). In the author's view, the change was self-explanatory.

162. The Employers' Vice-Chairman and Workers' Vice-Chairman stated that the amendment was acceptable to them, provided that it did not have any unforeseen effect on the rest of the paragraph.

163. Amendment D.49 was adopted.

164. Amendment D.64, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, sought to delete the words "income distribution" from operative paragraph 1(e).

165. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Tunisia explained that, without a clearer description of what exactly was meant by "income distribution", the phrase was redundant. On the other hand, the co-authors could accept the idea that structural adjustment programmes might have a negative impact on the "employment and well-being of the whole population". A further anomaly in the original draft text was the notion of integrating social protection measures into the "initiation, design and implementation" of structural adjustment programmes, since in some countries such programmes were already under way.

166. The Workers' Vice-Chairman stressed that account should be taken of the three main areas in which social protection measures could have an impact - employment, income distribution, with its implications for a fair society, and the well-being of the whole population.

167. The Employers' Vice-Chairman had initially had no problem with the words "income distribution", as he had viewed them in the context of the title of the resolution, which concerned social protection. He sought reassurance that this was in fact the case.

168. The Government member of Denmark strongly supported the original draft text. In his view it was a matter of fact that social protection measures applied in conjunction with structural adjustment programmes would have an impact on income distribution and would thereby alleviate poverty.

169. The Government members of Sweden and Nicaragua also expressed their support for the original text, as fair income distribution was basic to the alleviation of poverty.

170. The Employers' Vice-Chairman proposed substituting "alleviation of poverty" for "income distribution" in order to take the various objections into account. The Workers' Vice-Chairman then proposed that the full phrase should read "taking into account their impact on employment, poverty and well-being". The Government member of the United Kingdom preferred to substitute "incomes" for "poverty" in this subamendment. Finally, the Workers' Vice-Chairman suggested the wording, "taking into account their impact on employment, incomes, poverty and the well-being of the whole population".

171. The Government member of Tunisia, in a spirit of compromise, agreed to the subamendment.

172. Amendment D.64, as subamended, was adopted.

173. Amendment D.65, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, sought to replace operative paragraph 1(f) by the following text:

> to extend social protection as an important element of a wider economic and social development strategy with a view to establishing a social assistance mechanism to alleviate the consequences of poverty;

174. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of India explained that the difficulty of the original draft text lay in the exact meaning of "economic income" and the word "ensure", which incorporated the idea of placing an obligation on governments to provide such an income. However, he said that his amendment retained the link between social protection and the establishment of a social assistance mechanism.

175. The Workers' Vice-Chairman found the amendment acceptable as a basis for further work. He pointed out that "economic income" expressed the idea found in paragraph III(d) of the Declaration of Philadelphia: "a minimum living wage to all employed and in need of such protection", or better still in paragraph III(f): "a basic income to all in need of such protection". He proposed subamending the amendment by inserting the following words after "with a view to": "providing a basic income to all in need of social protection and". He also proposed changing "a social assistance mechanism" to the plural.

176. The Government member of Nicaragua strongly disagreed with the proposed subamendment. It was essential to take into account the different economic capacities of countries, as not all of them could guarantee basic income support. The Report of the Director-General had established a clear distinction between developing countries and developed countries in this respect.

177. The Workers' Vice-Chairman replied by saying that he was only proposing a form of wording that was already in the Declaration of Philadelphia, which was annexed to the Constitution of the International Labour Organization. He also referred to page 79 of the Report of the Director-General, Social insurance and social protection, where a "basic universal support system" was suggested by way of a direction in which countries should be moving in terms of social protection.

178. The Government member of Sweden, while understanding the point made by the Government member of Nicaragua, pointed out that there were two qualifying phrases in this case. The first was "with a view to", while the second was the word "invites" in the introductory section of the operative part of the resolution. The Government member of Denmark also expressed his support for the subamended amendment.

179. The Employers' Vice-Chairman further underlined that, from the start, the Organization had recognized the different levels of development of countries. He quoted from paragraph V of the Declaration of Philadelphia as follows:

> The Conference affirms that the principles set forth in this Declaration are fully applicable to all peoples everywhere and that, while the manner of their application must be determined with due regard to the stage of social and economic development reached by each people, their progressive application to peoples who are still dependent, as well as to those who have already achieved self-government, is a matter of concern to the whole civilized world.

180. The Government member of Tunisia agreed to accept the subamendment proposed by the Workers' Vice-Chairman. Amendment D.65, as subamended, was adopted.

181. As a result, amendment D.18, submitted by the Employers' group, D.50, submitted by the Government member of the Czech Republic, and D.74, submitted by the Government member of the United States, all of which addressed the same paragraph, fell.

182. Amendment D.66, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, sought to replace operative paragraph 1(g) by the following text:

> to promote the management of social protection schemes, based on the principles of shared responsibility and taking into account the various limitations and socio-economic specificities;

183. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Tunisia referred to the consistent approach adopted by himself and his co-authors in stressing the principle of shared responsibility between the social partners and the need to take socio-economic specificities into account. Their aim was to contribute towards making a more realistic resolution that was not confined to provisions which many countries would not be able to implement.

184. The Workers' Vice-Chairman hoped that the explanations and quotations given by certain members of the Committee had helped to allay some of the fears expressed by the previous speaker. He reiterated that the principles referred to in the resolution outlined the direction in which countries should be moving, and confirmed that everyone understood the particular and specific economic circumstances of different countries. He went on to express his concern that the principle of solidarity had been dropped, even though it was referred to in the Report of the Director-General and was not contested in principle. He also wished to restore the idea of participation by employers' and workers' organizations, which had been in the original draft text. On the other hand, he would be happy to drop the words "the management of".

185. The Government member of Algeria also asked if "the management of" could be deleted for clarity and the principle of solidarity could be restored.

186. The Government member of Germany stated that the concerns of the co-authors of the present amendment were dealt with in the original draft text, in that "insurance" cover could be extended only in relation to contributions received. The notion of solidarity was also present.

187. The Government member of Denmark supported the original draft text, pointing out that it did not specify any level or time for the social protection schemes promoted. Furthermore, it referred to the participation of employers' and workers' organizations.

188. The Government member of Tunisia agreed to the deletion of "the management of" and suggested subamending the text by adding "within a framework of active solidarity" after "social protection schemes".

189. The Employers' Vice-Chairman said that his group's only problem with the paragraph had been the words "the management of", as indicated by amendment D.19. He understood that the statement "based on the principles of shared responsibility" in the present amendment referred to its shared responsibility by the members of the community. He, too, wished to see some reference to the principle of insurance in this paragraph.

190. After a short break for discussion, the Workers' Vice-Chairman indicated that a large majority of the Committee seemed to be in favour of retaining the original text. He suggested that the Committee should move to a discussion of amendment D.19, which sought the deletion of "the management of".

191. The Government member of India proposed the following subamendment:

> ... to promote social protection schemes, based on the principles of insurance, solidarity and shared responsibility with the participation of employers' and workers' organizations.

192. Amendment D.66, as subamended, was adopted.

193. As a result, amendment D.19, submitted by the Employers' group, fell.

194. Amendment D.67, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, sought to replace the text of paragraph 1(h) by the following:

> to review their economic and social policies in the light of their contribution to the eradication of unemployment;

195. The Government member of India, inroducing the amendment, pointed out that his proposed text was self-explanatory and sought to avoid a repetition of what appeared elsewhere in the resolution.

196. The Government member of Mexico supported the existing text.

197. The Government member of the United Kingdom proposed the addition, at the end of the sentence, of the words "and the promotion of full, freely chosen and productive employment, through sustained economic growth and development, and having appropriate regard to the principles of all relevant international labour standards".

198. The Employers' Vice-Chairman quoted from the text of Convention No. 122 to show that countries should "promote full, productive and freely chosen employment".

199. The Government member of Denmark supported the subamendment proposed by the Government member of the United Kingdom, as well as the statement made by the Employers' Vice-Chairman.

200. The Workers' Vice-Chairman felt that, in this case, the word "appropriate" should be deleted.

201. Amendment D.67, as subamended, was adopted. As a result, amendments D.20, submitted by the Employers' group, and D.37, submitted by the Government members of Canada and the United Kingdom, which sought to amend the same paragraph, fell.

202. Amendment D.38, submitted by the Government members of Canada, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, which sought to delete from paragraph 1(i) the words "to cooperate in the ILO", was adopted without discussion.

203. The introductory section of paragraph 2 was adopted without discussion.

204. Amendment D.6, submitted by the Government member of Austria, which sought to amend paragraph 2(a), was withdrawn by the author.

205. Amendment D.68, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, sought to replace paragraph 2(b) by the following text:

> to promote adequate advisory services and technical cooperation for the development of mechanisms of social protection in developing countries and those countries which have embarked on the transition to a market economy or are engaged in the process of structural adjustment;

206. The Government member of Tunisia, introducing the amendment, stressed that it was important in the context of this paragraph to mention the beneficiaries: developing countries.

207. The Government member of the Russian Federation had no objection to amendment D.68 except that it omitted the reference to "monitoring the social situation" in the countries concerned.

208. The Government member of the United Kingdom was concerned by the financial implications that this paragraph might have for the ILO. The use of "adequate" in this context was not realistic. It would be possible for the ILO to monitor the situation in a representative sample of countries, but not in all countries.

209. The Workers' Vice-Chairman believed that it was important for the ILO to monitor the situation in the countries concerned. The Governing Body would not ask the Director-General to initiate activities without the corresponding funds. The monitoring of a representative sample would be discriminatory. It would be better to monitor the overall situation in all the countries concerned.

210. The Government members of Algeria and Mexico asked what was the aim of this monitoring and how this was to be done. They thought that the important point was that the ILO should support countries with a technical cooperation programme. No monitoring system other than the existing ILO supervisory bodies was necessary.

211. The Government member of Germany said that the deletion of "adequate" was not enough. The ILO already observed the situation in all countries and collected statistics and other information. It might be impossible for the ILO to place a monitoring consultancy service in every country but there must be ways to link the monitoring to technical cooperation and advisory services.

212. The Government member of Denmark also agreed to delete "adequate". He referred to the need to evaluate the effective use of resources made available for technical cooperation. He believed that the insertion of the words "developing countries" in the original text would satisfy the wishes of the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia.

213. The Employers' Vice-Chairman referred to Article 10 of the Constitution of the ILO to point out that the Office had to gather information about the situation in relation to labour and therefore the "monitoring" of the social situation was nothing new.

214. The Government members of India, Nicaragua, Mexico and the Sudan did not agree with suggestions to delete "adequate" since advisory services and technical cooperation should be of adequate quality and volume for the needs of the countries concerned.

215. The Government member of the Sudan also supported the insertion of a reference to "developing countries" and "monitoring".

216. The Workers' Vice-Chairman identified the elements which he thought the Committee as a whole could accept in this paragraph and made a proposal based on amendment D.68, which included the promotion of advisory services and technical cooperation and the monitoring of the social situation in the countries concerned.

217. This text, considerably modified during a recess called by the Chairman, was adopted by the Committee. It replaced the reference to "monitoring" by the words: "and to analyse their effectiveness in improving social protection in these countries". As a result amendments D.39, submitted by the Government members of Canada, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, and D.40, submitted by the Government member of the United Kingdom, on the same paragraph, were not discussed.

218. Amendment D.69, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, aimed at the replacement of paragraph 2(c) by the following:

> to assist governments in introducing programmes of social protection in their economic, labour and social development;

219. The Government member of India explained that the intent of the amendment was to streamline the text in order to express the needs of the beneficiary governments while leaving out the wording on "promotion of democracy", which was vague in its meaning and did not seem to belong there.

220. The Government member of Austria suggested the addition of "in conformity with international labour standards" but the Employers' Vice-Chairman was against this suggestion.

221. The Government member of the United Kingdom proposed alternative wording which had already been used in the resolution but regretted that the expression "active labour market policies" had been omitted by the authors of the amendment.

222. The Workers' Vice-Chairman said that he could reluctantly agree to leave out in this paragraph the references to "promotion of democracy" and also to "international labour standards", although the Workers' group supported the amendment made by the Government member of Austria. He suggested replacing the word "introducing" by "incorporating". In addition, he proposed adding the word "market" after "labour", so that the text would read:

> to assist governments in incorporating programmes of social protection in their economic, labour market and social development policies;

223. This proposal was accepted and amendment D.69 as subamended was adopted. Consequently, amendment D.7, submitted by the Government member of Austria, fell.

224. Amendment D.24, submitted by the Government members of Canada, Finland and Sweden, which sought to delete the word "necessary" from paragraph 2(d), was adopted by the Committee without discussion.

225. Operative paragraph 2(e) was adopted without amendment.

226. Amendment D.21, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace the words "struggle against" with the words "problems of", and to replace the word "is" with the word "are" in paragraph 2(f).

227. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that his group had wanted to focus on what should be given attention. It was, therefore, more accurate to talk about the "problems of poverty, marginalization and exclusion" rather than "the struggle against poverty, marginalization and exclusion".

228. The Workers' Vice-Chairman agreed to the proposed wording.

229. On a question from the Government member of the United Kingdom as to whether amendment D.41 would fall if amendment D.21 was adopted, the Employers' Vice-Chairman agreed to withdraw amendment D.21.

230. Amendment D.41, submitted by the Government members of Canada, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, sought to replace the words "the struggle against poverty, marginalization and exclusion" by the words "the fight against poverty and unemployment, and the need to promote job growth and access to employment and social protection for disadvantaged groups" in operative paragraph 2(f).

231. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom stated that she would have no problem in substituting "the problems of" for "the fight against" in the present amendment. The aim of the amendment had been to include a number of positive goals into the paragraph to counterbalance the more negative ideas in the first part of the paragraph.

232. The Workers' Vice-Chairman said that, as "marginalization" had been omitted from certain earlier paragraphs, he could accept its omission here. However, he would like to retain a reference to "exclusion", as it also appeared in a preambular paragraph and referred to the actual situation in many countries, including industrialized countries. He suggested replacing "job growth" by "job creation". He proposed subamending the amendment as follows: "the problems of poverty, exclusion and unemployment, and the need to promote job creation and access to employment and social protection for disadvantaged groups, are given".

233. The Government members of the United Kingdom and Canada agreed with the proposal and asked if the co-authors of amendment D.70 could also accept it.

234. The Government member of India, on being reassured that the idea of "exclusion" had been retained in redrafted preambular paragraph 9 (new preambular paragraph 11), and the Government member of Tunisia accepted the subamendment.

235. Amendment D.41, as subamended, was adopted.

236. As a result, amendment D.70, which addressed the same paragraph, fell.

237. Amendment D.26, submitted by the Government member of Angola, was withdrawn.

238. Amendment D.27, submitted by the Government members of Canada and the United Kingdom, sought to replace the words "in order to ensure that" by the words "with a view to having".

239. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom explained that the amendment related to procedure rather than policy. The words "in order to ensure that" implied that it was within the power of the ILO to direct the work of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, which was clearly not the case. The words "with a view to having" reflected the idea of what the ILO should be attempting to achieve.

240. After a discussion on the interpretation of various alternative subamendments proposed by the Workers' Vice-Chairman and the Government members of the United Kingdom and Germany, the Employers' Vice-Chairman declared that the wording of the amendment best expressed the views of the previous speakers.

241. Amendment D.27 was adopted.

242. Amendment D.71, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, sought to replace, in operative paragraph 2(g), the words "ensure that their programmes of assistance take into account the need for social protection" by the words "mitigate the adverse effects of structural adjustment programmes and to ensure that their programmes of assistance provide the necessary financial resources for social protection to be extended to the vulnerable groups".

243. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Tunisia explained the point of view the co-authors had consistently presented in their amendments. They considered that structural adjustment programmes were imposed by international financial institutions, especially the IMF. Earlier they had sought to include references to the effects of structural adjustment programmes in the resolution. Likewise, in this paragraph they were proposing wording that would ensure that a solution was found to mitigate these effects. Social protection schemes required a considerable amount of financial backing, and it was the international financial institutions which could best support developing countries attempting to launch such programmes.

244. The Government member of Sweden agreed with the need to mitigate the effects of structural adjustment programmes, and said that it was important to make this point in the appropriate way to the governing bodies of the financial institutions. The original draft text of the paragraph reflected the need for the ILO to provide input on social matters, just as the WHO programme on AIDS provided inputs to World Bank programmes.

245. The Workers' Vice-Chairman noted that, while the original draft text outlined what the programmes of the financial institutions should take into account, amendment D.71 seemed to be talking about what the ILO should do. He would listen with interest to further discussion on the amendment, but proposed a subamendment to aid such discussion. He proposed adding at the end of the original draft paragraph the words "and thus contribute to mitigating the adverse effects of structural adjustment programmes".

246. The Government member of Tunisia stated that everyone knew the focal point of the ILO was social protection. This objective should be implemented, but resources were necessary in order to do so. The present amendment was therefore logical, as it was surely part of the activity of the ILO, through its relationship with the financial institutions, to secure such resources.

247. The Government member of Germany pointed out that, through amendment D.27, the Committee had rejected the notion that the ILO could "ensure" that the social component was taken into account by the financial institutions. The present amendment sought to "ensure" that financial resources should be provided. As it was not within the ILO's power to "ensure" that another organization should follow a particular course, he asked the co-authors of the amendment to examine the subamendment proposed by the Workers' Vice-Chairman.

248. The Government member of the United Kingdom supported the views of the previous speaker. Whatever the ILO might want to do, it was not certain to be able to do it. On the other hand, it was possible for the ILO to increase its links and influence with these institutions, and this idea was present in the subamendment of the Workers' Vice-Chairman, which combined a sense of purpose with a sense of pragmatism.

249. The Employers' Vice-Chairman then proposed adding the following words after the semi-colon at the end of paragraph 2(g): "this cooperation should aim to mitigate the adverse effects of structural adjustment programmes". The wording was acceptable to the Workers' Vice-Chairman.

250. The Government member of Denmark preferred to remain with the subamendment made by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, but suggested replacing "and thus" by "in order to".

251. The Government member of Tunisia found some contradiction in the approach of the Committee in that when he and his co-authors had mentioned objectives that were impossible for their countries to fulfil, the Committee had responded that they could be fulfilled at some future date. Here the reverse was the case. It was of highest importance that the idea of securing financial resources should be maintained in this paragraph.

252. The Government member of India proposed the following sub-subamendment: "and thus contribute financial resources to mitigating the adverse effects of structural adjustment programmes".

253. The Employers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that there was a need to clarify the various messages under discussion and to agree on a form of words which had a definite meaning and could be implemented. On the one hand there was the idea of inviting the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to carry out the actions listed in the operative part of the resolution, and on the other hand there was the question of who would make available the financial resources required to mitigate the adverse effects of structural adjustment programmes.

254. The Government member of Sweden stressed that the question of financial resources was a separate issue, as countries could negotiate with the lending institutions in respect of the use to which they put a loan. In this paragraph, it was important to concentrate on developing close cooperation with the international financial institutions.

255. The Government member of India declared that he would not insist on maintaining amendment D.71, but repeated that the provision of resources by the international financial institutions was essential if social protection was to be extended to the vulnerable groups.

256. Finding that there was no opposition to the subamendment proposed by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, the Chairman declared that paragraph 2(g) was adopted as follows:

> to develop, intensify and institutionalize close cooperation with the international financial institutions such as the IMF, the World Bank, the regional reconstruction and development banks and other international bodies concerned with a view to having their programmes of assistance take into account the need for social protection, and thus contribute to mitigating the adverse effects of structural adjustment programmes;

257. Amendment D.51, submitted by the Government member of the Czech Republic, and seconded by the Government member of Austria, proposed to delete paragraph 2(h).

258. In introducing the amendment, he said that he had no objection to the substance of this paragraph. If the ILO Programme and Budget provided for activities on any topic, then, an evaluation of these activities must be carried out. Therefore, it was not necessary to have this paragraph in the resolution.

259. The Workers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that there was an internal balance in the resolution with the last four operative paragraphs covering the work of one or more institutions. The one under discussion was intended to guide the ILO. The Workers' group did not want to lose that balance and appealed to the author to withdraw the amendment.

260. The Government member of Germany agreed with the Workers' group. He believed there was no harm in highlighting what the Director-General would no doubt undertake in any case. The Government member of Sweden also agreed with this position.

261. The Government member of the Czech Republic again pointed out that he was not against the substance of the paragraph, and withdrew the amendment.

262. Amendment D.72, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, proposed to delete from paragraph 2(h) the words "including proposals concerning ILO work and standards, as appropriate".

263. The Government member of India introduced the amendment and remarked the phrase which he wanted deleted singled out standards among all the other means of action of the ILO. Otherwise, he could agree with the paragraph.

264. The Workers' Vice-Chairman replied that the reference to standards was a matter of fact, not a proposal for new standards. Any activity should be evaluated in the light of its implications for all ILO work, including standard setting and revising standards, technical cooperation, research and so on. He proposed alternative wording as follows: "including research and analysis, technical cooperation, standards and other work, as appropriate".

265. The Employers' Vice-Chairman said that he was also inclined to join those who wanted to delete "standards" since he was not clear as to which standards the text was referring to in the context of the alleviation of poverty. He could, however, accept wording such as "including standards" or "which may include" and wanted to replace "struggle" by "alleviation".

266. The Government member of the United States stated that she had supported the resolution from the outset and that she favoured the original text of the paragraph in question. She could not support the amendment and agreed with the Workers as to the need for constant evaluation of standards. She could also accept words such as "including standards" but not "may include". The Government member of Sweden supported this position.

267. The Government member of India pointed out that he was definitely not against evaluation of ILO activities but was not happy with singling out standards when the ILO had other important areas of work as well including for example technical cooperation.

268. The Government member of Denmark could not accept the word "may" in this context.

269. The Government member of the United Kingdom had no problem with the Workers' position, as it reflected the fact that it was too early to know the nature of the proposals which would be made. However, she would also like to alter the word "struggle" which appeared in the original text to reflect similar changes already agreed elsewhere in the text.

270. Finally the following compromise text, proposed by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, which was adopted by the Committee, took account not only of amendment D.72 but also of most of the proposed subamendments:

> to monitor closely the contribution of ILO activities to the alleviation of poverty, which is one of the priority objectives in the 1994-95 programme, and to present a final evaluation at the end of the biennium, with appropriate proposals concerning research and analysis, technical cooperation, standards and other ILO work;

271. Amendment D.25, submitted by the Government members of Finland and Sweden which sought to delete the word "necessary" from paragraph 2(i), was adopted without discussion.

272. Amendment D.73, submitted by the Government members of Egypt, India and Tunisia, sought to replace, in paragraph 2(i), the words "promotion of full, freely chosen and productive employment, social protection and freedom of association" by the words "eradication of unemployment and social protection".

273. The Government member of India, introducing the amendment, said that the resolution emphasized the alleviation of poverty and social protection. He strongly felt that the expression "freedom of association", which just cropped up as the last words of the resolution, and was not discussed in any substantive manner, was out of context and therefore should be deleted.

274. The Workers' Vice-Chairman explained that this last paragraph of the resolution was intended to guide the ILO in its essential role in the work of the World Summit for Social Development and its follow-up. Freedom of association was, in his view, a central aspect of the ILO's action. He could not accept to delete this reference.

275. The Government member of Germany declared that he expected the ILO's contribution at the World Summit to reflect the tripartite structure of the Organization. In this context, he felt that "freedom of association" was an essential factor in social development since governments needed the contribution of the social partners in the creation of employment and the eradication of poverty.

276. The Government member of France observed that the deletion of the reference to "freedom of association" would send the wrong message to the rest of the Conference and to public opinion. This was what the ILO stood for. He appealed to the authors of the amendment to withdraw it. He was supported by the Government members of Argentina, Sweden and the United Kingdom.

277. The Government member of India emphasized again that he was not at all against the principle of freedom of association. However, what he questioned was adding it when there was no earlier reference in the text or in the discussions to this aspect and the thrust of the resolution was only on structural adjustment and poverty.

278. The Employers' Vice-Chairman suggested that words could be inserted to specify that the issues mentioned at the end of the paragraph, including freedom of association, were derived from the mandate of the ILO.

279. The Government member of Tunisia agreed with this suggestion and observed that freedom of association was enshrined in his country's legislation.

280. The paragraph as subamended was adopted and read as follows:

> to take measures to ensure the essential contribution of the ILO, through its tripartite structure, in the preparation, convening and follow-up of the World Summit for Social Development, giving particular emphasis to issues within the scope of the mandate of the ILO which include the elimination of poverty, the promotion of full, freely chosen and productive employment, social protection and freedom of association.

281. The operative part of the resolution was adopted as amended.

Adoption of the resolution

282. The resolution concerning social protection and the alleviation of unemployment and poverty, and the social dimension of structural adjustment and transition to a market economy was adopted, as amended, by consensus.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE COMMEMORATION OF THE 75TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

Presentation of the resolution

283. Introducing the resolution, the Employers' member of France noted that in 1994 the ILO would be commemorating not only its 75th anniversary but also the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. This important event should be regarded not only as a celebration but also as a chance for the Organization to look towards the future. He recalled that the authors of the Declaration of Philadelphia, meeting towards the end of the Second World War, did a fine job in establishing a new direction for the ILO. If we were to re-read the text of the Declaration, we would see that the immediate post-war years were a time of illusions and that the social situation was just as serious at present as it had been in those years. There had been a brief period of hope during 1989-90, with the collapse of the totalitarian communist system and the end of the Berlin Wall. However, although this might have put an end to ideological conflicts, political tensions remained. In addition, all countries were facing problems linked to structural adjustment, with their different social consequences for which the ILO was responsible for finding solutions.

284. All agreed that, at the close of the twentieth century and the start of the next one, the Organization had a unique opportunity to see where it stood. The Director-General had already decided to devote the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference in 1994 to a review of the fundamental objectives of the ILO, a decision that had not been known when the resolution was drafted. It was also an opportunity for all member States of the ILO, as well as for employers and workers, to contribute their own ideas. The resolution was not based on the views of the Employers' group; it was a procedural resolution that did not intend to dictate the content of the 1994 discussion. The 81st Session of the International Labour Conference could become a milestone, as had the Declaration of Philadelphia. The reconciliation of the objectives of the different groups would be in accordance with the spirit of tripartism. It was not a question of adopting the draft resolution as it stood but this group was open to discuss constructive amendments. A main aim was to make an appointment for discussion in 1994. A second stage would be to consider the Organization's means of action, including standards, meetings, technical committees, technical cooperation, publications, and the exchange of ideas, which should all contribute to its objectives. The resolution strove to be neutral in content, and was open to amendment or improvement. Above all, it should be the subject of broad consensus.

General discussion

285. The Employers' member of France thanked all the delegations who had voted for this resolution and helped give it a high priority. This resolution was not meant to be a "war machine" against the ILO, the Director-General or the Workers. The Employers' group intended it to be a reaffirmation of their continued commitment to the fundamental values of the Organization. They believed also that the resolution would reinforce the initiatives taken by the Director-General and that it would allow a renewal of the dialogue with the Workers' group on the future role of the ILO. The objective of the resolution was not to impose the views of the Employers on the Conference but rather to set the scene for the full debate which would be held in 1994. It was meant to start a thinking process which might lead to the adoption of a charter containing the fundamental orientations of the ILO for the next 75 years, much like the Declaration of Philadelphia had been in 1944. The Employers' group strongly believed that they had presented a neutral text which could be amended if necessary to make it acceptable to the rest of the Committee. In conclusion, the speaker reassured the Committee that his group had no hidden agenda and that their only wish was to start a constructive debate on the future of the ILO.

286. The Government member of Canada recalled that the Director-General had put before the Governing Body a paper on the 1994-95 Programme and Budget which reviewed the ILO's mandate and objectives. The Director-General had, when introducing the paper, underlined that the ILO had a problem of credibility and would have to prove its relevance in the 1990s, if it was to maintain its leadership on social matters. It would have to adapt to the needs of all its constituents, not only workers' and employers' organizations but also governments who demanded more policy advice, a lighter burden of meetings, a more measured pace of standard setting and a reduction in the bureaucracy of the standards supervisory system. The Director-General had demonstrated an acute awareness of the changed environment in which the ILO operated and had already launched a process of renewal which would carry the Organization into the next century. The resolution which was before the Committee fell squarely within that reform process and could be wholeheartedly supported by the Government of Canada. The operative part of the resolution was worded in general terms and would constitute a declaration of support for the initiatves already under way. The speaker hoped that the Committee would refrain from making more detailed recommendations at this stage. There would be plenty of time to discuss the specifics of reform in the appropriate forums.

287. The Government member of the United Kingdom also recalled that the discussions on the Programme and Budget in 1992 had demonstrated that the time had come for the ILO to undergo a process of reform and renewal in order to maintain a position of credibility on the world stage. In this context, she appreciated the efforts made by the Director-General in moving towards a streamlining of the organs of the ILO, reducing the burden of reporting by governments, decentralizing field activities and putting into action the policy of active partnership. She believed the plenary of the Conference next year would be an excellent opportunity to discuss the future of the Organization. In that context, the resolution was a very constructive and forward-looking contribution to the debate. In her view, there was no sinister intent in the text, which remained in general terms. She would submit a limited number of amendments to the text since some aspects of the wording might cause problems.

288. The Government member of Spain pointed out that the text of the resolution did not match its title. Besides, the text did not take account of the reform process to which the ILO was committed and which had already commenced. He recalled that more than 20 years ago, there had been a discussion on the structure of the Organization. In 1986, when the world social and political situation had been very different from today's situation, an amendment to the Constitution had been approved. While the amendment had been ratified by 86 States, it had obtained only three of the required five ratifications from the nations of chief industrial importance. In order to put this debate in the right perspective, he wished to know whether the 1986 amendment was considered by some to be already obsolete, although he considered it to be still legally valid. The celebration of the ILO's 75th anniversary should be left to the Director-General, and the Resolutions Committee should discuss those issues at another time. In his opinion, the resolution under consideration had been inspired by a document distributed unofficially during the 255th Session of the Governing Body by the International Organization of Employers and which dealt with the need for an in-depth reform of the ILO. He referred to other problems in the ILO, such as the rigid distribution of seats on the Governing Body on the basis of gentlemen's agreements which might not be objectively fair nor geographically balanced. He asked how long this restrictive procedure, which Spain had always respected in spite of difficulties in accepting it, was to continue. His Government considered that this resolution could be a basis for reflection but was not in agreement with some aspects of the text. If there was a consensus in the Committee, he would be prepared to support the resolution.

However, it would be more appropriate to leave these issues in the expectation of new proposals by the Director-General to the Governing Body, and to the plenary discussion at the 1994 Session of the Conference.

289. The Government member of Germany indicated that his Government was not in favour of the discussion of this resolution at the present session of the Conference. He would have preferred a consensus resolution to be presented jointly by all the groups next year, which was the 75th anniversary of the Constitution and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. However, since the resolution had obtained a high priority by vote, it forced a discussion on reform which should remain limited to procedure rather than substance. He hoped that the debate would provide clarification on the procedure for a full and substantive discussion next year.

290. The Government member of the United States stated that the resolution seemed inspired by a paper distributed by the International Organization of Employers during the 255th Session of the Governing Body in February 1993. Some of the ideas raised were interesting but others were troubling. The resolution had achieved a discussion on these issues at this Conference, as that paper had asked, although he had some doubts as to whether the Committee was the right place for this. He was reassured by the declaration of the Employers' group that the resolution was not a "war machine". His Government strongly favoured the objectives, structure and procedures of the ILO and was not convinced of the need to review or redefine them. It should be recognized that the ILO had already engaged in a process of reorganization: e.g. the changes in the Conference and the Governing Body, the policy of active partnership and the setting up of the multidisciplinary teams and had included an in-depth review of the industrial committee system in its 1994-95 Programme and Budget. He was not convinced, however, that there was a need to reform the top level structure of the Organization. Any amendments he proposed would aim to make the ILO more effective.

291. The Government member of Kuwait expressed his appreciation for the role played by the United Nations, the specialized agencies and their member States at a time when his country was in a crisis. He approved the resolution which, he believed, should encourage the ILO to improve its work for greater social justice and lead to a renewal of the principles the Organization stood for, especially that all human beings should have a better future.

292. The Government member of Poland observed that 1994 would be an important date for workers: the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. He favoured commemorating these anniversaries in an appropriate manner. In Poland the special events to commemorate these anniversaries would be under the patronage of the President of the Republic. He believed that the 81st Session of the Conference should adopt a special declaration to mark this special date. This year, however, he was disappointed that important questions such as child labour had not obtained a higher priority for discussion by the Committee.

293. The Government member of the Czech Republic stated that the question of reform of the ILO was on the table at the right time, and stressed that any reform should correspond to the needs of constituents. The process had, in fact, already begun to take place but could still be the subject of discussion. His delegation supported the resolution with some reservations and felt that it should avoid any overt criticism of the ILO. Therefore, certain changes to the text would be necessary.

294. The Government member of Japan reiterated his Government's full support for the basic principles of the ILO, as expressed in the Declaration of Philadelphia, as well as its wishes to continue to play an important role in ILO activities. Nevertheless, he shared the view of the authors of the resolution that account should be taken of the dramatic changes which had occurred and appropriate changes should be made in the future activities of the ILO so as to meet the urgent social needs of the peoples of the world. Therefore, his Government approved the propqsal to start a tripartite discussion on functional changes in the ILO. He concluded by declaring his support for this resolution on the understanding that the parties concerned did not reach a consensus on any particular direction which the reform would take and that the discussion in the plenary of the Conference in 1994 should be completely open.

295. The Government member of India agreed with previous speakers that the 75th anniversary of the ILO was a unique opportunity to evaluate its role and that member States were all looking for a vibrant and purposeful ILO. He believed that the Organization should adapt to the world economic and political climate and therefore could express his general support for the resolution.

296. The Government member of Mexico welcomed the idea of a resolution to commemorate the 75th anniversary of the ILO, but regretted the fact that the text was not aimed at exalting the high objectives of the ILO or of reaffirming its mandate. The anniversary should aim to evaluate the achievements of the ILO in the pursuit of its objectives, identifying what had not yet been done and why. The text of the resolution led one to believe that this task had already been carried out and that the result was a proposal for radical change. However, there was a need for consensus on the draft, and for participation by all the ILO's constituents in the reform of the Organization. Her Government was convinced that this reform was necessary to enable the ILO to respond effectively to the new challenges of the world of labour. Nevertheless, the principles set out in the Preamble of the Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia were still relevant. The actions of multinational enterprises, the introduction of new technologies, and innovations in communications and transport, and in the processing of information, had placed relations between business, labour, the State and society in a new context. A few days ago a Latin American Minister of Labour had spoken of the need to enhance labour in the recognition of human dignity, reassess the role of business, strengthen trade union action and redefine the role of the State. Institutions should be modernized to take account of changes in economies that were destroying traditional forms of coexistence, but their objectives and principles should not necessarily be changed, since the urgent problems that had given rise to them - inequality and poverty - still prevailed. One of the reasons for strengthening the ILO remained the need to ensure at least a minimum level of conditions of work and employment throughout the world so that the ideas of free enterprise and competition were accompanied by social progress and development. The globalization of the world economy had given rise to a new international division of labour which was justified by the imperatives of competitiveness and productivity. Decisions on investment, production and employment, which determined the standard of living in many countries, were increasingly concentrated in large multinational enterprises. Adequate forms of negotiation and association were essential in order to maintain social equilibrium and to arrest the widening gap between rich and poor countries, and within countries. At an international level, the ILO had been assigned the role of ensuring stability amid this dysfunctioning. Mexico supported any serious proposal that might help to solve these problems or to improve the effectiveness of the ILO.

297. The Government member of France stated that the reform of the ILO was a very complex and ambitious undertaking. It should be worthy of the founders of the Organization, as well as of the drafters of the Declaration of Philadelphia. The necessary reflection process should consider the Organization's obligations as a specialized agency of the Unitd Nations, and the needs of its constituent social partners. For these reasons, it appeared that there was a need to obtain the widest consensus among and within constituents as to how this reform was to take place. He agreed that the ILO should, on its 75th anniversary, commit itself to a reform process. It should be noted, however, that the Director-General had already not only put before the Governing Body certain proposals for reform, but also implemented specific measures in this regard. Therefore, the speaker suggested that the resolution should make references to the reform process which was already under way in the ILO.

298. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic emphasized the importance of the ILO within the United Nations system, owing to its tripartite structure and the issues with which it was concerned. Since 1919 it had won a worldwide reputation by adopting international labour standards, providing assistance and fulfilling most of the objectives it was created to promote. The resolution should be aimed at helping workers and employers work together and at safeguarding tripartism and the principles of the Declaration of Philadelphia, which were still relevant to most productive activities. In a climate of structural change, it was essential to preserve the legislation that had been won for workers. His amendments would serve to highlight the importance in the future of equality and absence from discrimination, irrespective of race, creed or sex.

299. The Workers' member of the Sudan confirmed that the best feature of the resolution was its title, as it recalled not only the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization but also, by association, the 50th anniversary of the adoption of the Declaration of Philadelphia concerning the aims and purposes of the Organization. The subject of the title concerned all three groups of the Committee, and the resolution had therefore come high on the list of priorities, but the text of the Preamble and the operative part took a somewhat one-sided view and did not take into account a joint approach to social justice and equality on the part of the social partners. As the text sought to restrict the mandate of the ILO and to limit its activities, any future dialogue based on the resolution might tend to digress from the main aims of the Organization. He indicated that amendments submitted by the Workers' group would express this view.

300. The Workers' Vice-Chairman raised the possibility that the purpose of the resolution might be misinterpreted, as the title did not correspond to its actual substance. His group naturally welcomed the idea of commemorating the 75th anniversary of the ILO, and had already responded positively to the suggestion that all countries should ratify at least one international labour Convention in 1994 to mark the occasion. This had not given rise to any objections during the recent discussion of the anniversary in the Governing Body. The substance of the draft resolution was analogous to a paper circulated by the employers informally at the time of the Governing Body in February. The text implied that the ILO did not function well and spoke of review and reform, without specifying the reasons for this. It was well known that this item would be considered during the anniversary year itself. The Director-General had already declared that this would be the subject of debate in 1994. The text of the resolution was also partially obsolete, as the reviews called for in preambular paragraph 14 and in operative paragraphs 1(c) and 1(d) had already been undertaken, while a review of the supervisory machinery was scheduled for the November 1993 Session of the Governing Body. He wondered in addition why no reference had been made to international labour standards, the supervisory machinery, the protection of workers, equality or the whole notion of tripartism, nor of the recently launched active partnership policy of the ILO or the establishment of multidisciplinary teams. The idea of "change" in the resolution remained vague and made the assumption that there was a consensus on the nature of such change. A multitude of changes were taking place - structural change, management practices, the proliferation of multinational enterprises and globalization - all raising questions on the relation between trade and labour standards at regional and international level, poverty and marginalization, the two-tier society, high and rising unemployment and the growing gap between economic growth and the creation of employment. Indeed, these serious structural issues were already being explored by the ILO. The draft text confused objectives and working methods. It was possible to talk about the latter in concrete terms, and to keep them under constant review, but there was no basis for reviewing the fundamental objectives. The resolution was a combination of disparate elements, ranging from statements of fact to overt ideological positions. The title was inaccurate, as it referred to the commemoration of the anniversary but the resolution was on extensive change in the aims and priorities of the ILO. His group was not against discussing the topics covered by the resolution, but a number of fundamental amendments would be necessary if the resolution was to be a tripartite one on revising the work of the ILO. These amendments would be made in the spirit of commitment to the authority and services of the ILO in a changing world.

301. The Government member of the Netherlands recalled the original presentation of the resolution by a member of the Employers' group, when it had been indicated that the purpose was not to challenge general principles but to aid the process of reform. The danger was that reviewing the objectives of the Organization might lead to a proliferation of aims, and hence to a weakened institution, when the aim was for the ILO to emerge from such a process with even more strength than before.

302. The Government member of Sri Lanka welcomed the laudable intention of the resolution to review and evaluate structures, objectives and systems, as any organization tended to become dysfunctional over time and numerous radical changes had taken place since the founding of the ILO. Another praiseworthy aspect of the resolution was its attempt to undertake the process of review from the bottom up rather than from the top down. However, he had some reservations over whether the resolution would be effective. Given the way in which it was framed, it might result in a multitude of proposals from a multitude of sources. Furthermore, the text did not indicate what follow-up there should be after the proposals had been made. While supporting the need to review the past and to make reforms, he doubted that the resolution, as drafted at present, would achieve that aim.

303. The Government member of Sweden, referring to operative paragraph 1 which sought a contribution from all constituents, stressed that, as one of the basic tenets of the ILO was to use dialogue, only through dialogue could the social partners truly make the process of reform their own. Sweden was committed to the reform of the UN system in general, and to multilateral action. Dialogue was important in both these cases. Some of the language of the resolution seemed to give the impression of calling for dialogue while in fact standing for something else. The whole process of reform, of which he was in favour, would benefit from being fully transparent, and ultimately the objectives of the Declaration of Philadelphia should remain fundamental to the ILO. He would be submitting amendments in this vein.

304. The Government member of Argentina agreed with earlier speakers that the 75th anniversary was an appropriate occasion for taking stock of ILO activities. However, agreement between the three constituents of the Committee was essential if a resolution was to be adopted on the subject. As President Menem had said in his address to the plenary session of the Conference, tripartite consensus on the basic principles of social justice had helped the ILO not only survive the Second World War but also adapt itself to changing circumstances. He considered that what could and should be modified were its working methods, as had been the case in 1986. Then, however, certain countries had not ratified the instrument of amendment. The recent Working Party on the reform of the Governing Body demonstrated that the ILO was continuing the process of reform, and it was in recognition of this process that he would lend support to the resolution.

305. The Government member of Denmark paid tribute to the tripartite approach of the ILO and to its longevity within the United Nations system, at the same time acknowledging that the 75th anniversary gave an opportunity to examine its structures and activities. Taking the six points in operative paragraph 1 of the resolution one by one, he stressed the need for the ILO's objectives and priorities to be relevant to its tripartite constituents, as well as the importance of its role as the one international organization devoted to labour matters. Its means of action, in combining the best of standard setting with the best of technical cooperation, required improvements in analytical capacity and the provision of policy advice, together with an active presence at the World Summit. Its practices, procedures and decision-making structures were already changing, as could be seen by the introduction of the active partnership policy, the establishment of multidisciplinary teams, and the strengthening of regional and national assistance, as well as the recent reforms of the International Labour Conference and the Governing Body. The ILO's efficiency would improve as a consequence of such changes. He pointed out that operative paragraph 1(f) was unnecessary, as the Director-General had already taken the decision to devote the discussion in the plenary of the 1994 Session of the Conference to the renewal of the Organization. He would not be proposing any amendments but would carefully study those submitted.

306. The Workers' member of Chile declared that the commemoration of the 75th anniversary was not an appropriate occasion for an analytical review of the Organization, but should be grasped as an opportunity for celebrating both the historical milestone of the founding of the ILO as an institution where, for the first time, governments, employers and workers could participate on an equal basis, and the special contribution made over 75 years towards the well-being of all human beings and particularly of workers and their families. The reference in preambular paragraph 9 to the creation of market economies based solely on private initiative could cause concern, as the ILO had, first and foremost, a social mission and should not support one type of economic system over another.

307. The Government member of Greece associated himself with the former speakers who had not been able to see any correspondence between the title and the text of the resolution. He was reminded of the position of the Employers' group of the Governing Body during the February 1993 Session, when they had declared that the ILO should be attempting to create employment rather than involving itself with legislative matters. Preambular paragraph 5 might seem to suggest that the mission of the ILO should be changed from a social to an economic one. He pointed out that the ILO's role was not only to set standards but also to carry out monitoring with the social aim of ensuring that they were being complied with. He asked whether, if the main function were to become an economic one, a similar form of monitoring would be required. Referring to preambular paragraph 12, he also questioned the nature of the cooperation with other international agencies that the ILO was exhorted to have in order to "create conditions that would foster wealth creation and employment", as the text seemed to focus more on financial institutions such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank than on institutions with a social dimension.

308. The Government member of Brazil stated that his Government was open to discussing reforms for improving the ILO and adapting it to changing circumstances. This was necessary in some areas. Technical cooperation should be strengthened, with more programmes providing assistance to developing countries, particularly during periods of structural adjustment, and in the domain of the application of standards and the strengthening of the capabilities of labour administrations. Alongside the monitoring and supervisory functions, he welcomed positive programmes, such as the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC), aimed at helping developing countries overcome their difficulties. On the other hand, the fundamental objectives of the ILO were not negotiable, nor was change required in every area. Stressing that the reforms already under way should be referred to in the text of the resolution, he hoped that the amendments submitted would enable the Committee to reach consensus.

309. The member of the Employers' group who had introduced the resolution welcomed the Committee's wide-ranging discussion, including the critical views expressed. He saw no contradiction between the title and the text, as the anniversary was an opportune moment for reflecting on the 75 years to come. Although the resolution had been sponsored by the Employers' group, consensus on a neutral text inviting the tripartite constitutents to reflect on the notion of reform and renewal was the basic aim. Hence no mention had been made of the paper circulated by the International Organization of Employers earlier in the year, nor of specific subjects covered by international labour standards. As far as preambular paragraphs 13 and 14 were concerned, it was not a question of examining the various areas of action of the ILO in detail, as had been suggested by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, but of reaffirming the fundamental principles and values upon which the ILO had been founded and considering how they should be given expression in the future. If the draft resolution had not referred to the reforms under way, which were indeed supported by his group, it was because the resolution was intended to be a forward-looking document. His group was, however, not opposed to mentioning these reforms. The purpose of the resolution was to prepare the way for a full tripartite debate at the 1994 Session of the International Labour Conference, which might perhaps give rise to a tripartite declaration, and he hoped that the text, after amendment, would express this idea as simply and concretely as possible.

310. The draft resolution was discussed but, for lack of time, it was not possible to consider any amendments.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE CONTRIBUTION OF THE ILO TO UNITED NATIONS ACTIVITIES FOR THE DEFENCE AND PROMOTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Presentation of the resolution

311. In presenting the resolution concerning the contribution of the ILO to United Nations activities for the defence and promotion of human rights, the Workers' member of Norway declared that the violation of fundamental human rights was a daily occurrence in a number of countries all over the world. Individuals and organizations were exposed to harassment, threats, violence and even killings. One of the most exposed groups was unionized workers. Before leaving for this year's International Labour Conference, she had been contacted by a number of trade union organizations asking for support in their struggle for the right to exercise trade union activities in their respective countries. Such contacts usually took the form of letters. A group of refugees had taken the initiative for a postcard campaign and she had received a great number of postcards from the group itself and its Norwegian friends. In addition she had received this year, as in other years, a report from the Norwegian division of Amnesty International containing information on gross violations of trade union rights in a number of countries. She knew that she was not the only one to receive such letters. A number of organizations and governments received the same, or similar, requests for attention to their cause. Trade union representatives who had formerly come to the Conference were now in prison. Some of the members of the Committee had friends who had been killed over the past year. Workers, and sometimes even employers, were deprived of their rights or exposed to harassment if their activities did not please the regime. It gave rise for concern that the number of incidents of harassment or violation of rights was not decreasing. The ICFTU's Annual Survey of violations of trade union rights was as comprehensive as in previous years and the ILO's own report from the Committee of Experts not only reported violations of technical Conventions but also gross violations of human rights. The length of the report was continuously increasing. It was regrettable that the World Conference on Human Rights was taking place at the same time as the International Labour Conference. Trade union rights, and in particular the right to organize, constituted an integral part of human rights, and no organization possessed greater knowledge of the extent to which this right was violated or knew more about the consequences of such violation, than the ILO. Respect for human rights was the basis for cooperation, democracy and development. The Workers' member of Norway stated that if anyone questioned the usefulness of international involvement and cooperation, they should look at the example of Manuel Bustos, one of the trade union leaders in Chile who had for years lived under constant pressure and under threat of being murdered. The day before he had been elected Workers' Vice-President of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

General discussion

312. The Workers' Vice-Chairman declared that the intent of the resolution was to strengthen the work of the ILO and its cooperation with the relevant United Nations bodies in the defence and promotion of human rights. It was timely since it coincided with the Vienna World Conference on Human Rights which, he hoped, would pave the way to renewed international cooperation in a field where all the constituents of the ILO were actively committed. The main operative part requested the Director-General to present proposals for ILO action as a follow-up of the Conference. The ILO had already a clear mandate in many aspects of human rights, inter alia, freedom of association, forced labour, discrimination and child labour. While there has been a certain amount of overlapping between the UN and the ILO in some of these aspects, the results of the UN in some areas of ILO competence, such as migrant workers, have not always been as good as one would have wanted. The Workers' group gave high priority to this resolution because the defence of human rights was so critical to it. The rights of trade unionists were frequently violated, as shown by the work of the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Committee of Experts on the Application of International Labour Standards, as well as the testimony of some of the members of the Workers' group. The Workers hoped that the Office would continue its efforts in favour of human rights and that the other groups would also renew their commitment to this cause.

313. The Workers' member of Rwanda thanked the Committee for having shown real interest and giving firm support to the resolution which he had presented on the situation in his country. The resolution under discussion, relating to human rights, dealt with the concerns which he had expressed in his own resolution. He underlined the importance of the preambular and operative paragraphs which related to the provision of technical advisory services to countries emerging from civil conflict or undemocratic rule such as Rwanda. The spirit of this resolution was closely related not only to the two operative paragraphs of his own resolution but also to the statement of the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Rwanda to the plenary of the Conference. In conclusion, he hoped that this Organization would give particular attention to the situation in Rwanda.

314. The Employers' Vice-Chairman expressed his full support for the defence and promotion of human rights. However, he would not have supported this resolution without amendments. For instance, the reaffirmation of fundamental human rights needed to rest on more solid ground than a report of the Director-General. The resolution focused too much on trade union rights and since that was not the title, it needed to deal more widely with human rights. Freedom of association was too often not applied to the rights of employers. It was not fair to exclude one group. He would have tried to restore the balance. In addition, the operative part prematurely endorsed the outcome of the Vienna Conference. He would have wanted to examine its conclusions carefully before giving his response. However, with the necessary amendments, he would have supported the resolution.

315. The Government member of the United States supported this resolution on the defence and promotion of human rights. It was especially topical as it coincided with the World Conference on Human Rights in Vienna. She strongly believed that the ILO had an important role to play in this area given its mandate in the field of worker and employer rights. She was pleased with the contribution of the Organization to the preparations for the World Conference. The East-West tensions were a thing of the past but, in many parts of the world, conflicts were escalating and human rights abuses were on the increase. A major goal of the United States at the World Conference in Vienna was to strengthen the United Nations' ability to promote and protect human rights and to provide a plan for improving its effectiveness in addressing all forms of abuses before they escalated. The United States strongly believed that there had to be coordination among all UN agencies in the field of human rights and that reform throughout the UN system would encourage donor nations to provide the funds that were essential for strengthening human rights machinery. Work was especially required concerning the rights of women and children. The United States hoped that this resolution would obtain top priority in this Committee next year.

316. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom declared that abuses of human rights did not occur solely in developing or totalitarian countries, but could also occur in stable parliamentary democracies. Thus, the second preambular paragraph of the draft resolution under discussion referred to trade union rights in the following way: "Underlining that trade union rights are an essential component of the overall body of human rights,". He regretted that the Government of the United Kingdom still violated freedom of association and exercised discrimination against trade unionists not only in the case of GCHQ, but recently by submitting an amendment during the reading of a Bill in the House of Lords to legitimize discrimination by employers against workers who wished to remain members of trade unions.

317. The Government member of Denmark, on a point of order, stated that the Committee was supposed to be discussing the substance of the resolution, which was the contribution of the ILO to United Nations activities for the defence and promotion of human rights, and not specific cases in particular countries.

318. The Workers' Vice-Chairman countered that the Workers' member of the United Kingdom should be able to conclude his remarks, as there was nothing wrong in hearing about the experience of human rights in different countries and regions. The Committee had already heard the intervention of the Workers' member of Rwanda, and now it had the possibility of listening to a case from another region.

319. The Government member of the United Kingdom intervened to say that, although she did not wish the Workers' member of the United Kingdom to be prevented from concluding his remarks, she felt that this was not the forum for discussing at a considerable level of detail a case from a particular country. There were other fora in the ILO for that purpose.

320. The Chairman invited the Workers' member of the United Kingdom to keep as closely as possible to the text of the resolution.

321. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom continued by describing circumstances which, he felt, supported his point of view. Freedom of association should go hand-in-hand with absence of discrimination. There were other forms of discrimination in the United Kingdom, such as discrimination against women, part-time workers and minorities. Such attacks on human rights could encroach on citizens even in a stable parliamentary democracy. A bulwark of free and independent trade unions was needed to withstand such pressures.

322. The Government member of Denmark addressed his comments to all three groups of the Committee. Even though the resolution concerned what the ILO could contribute to the United Nations, there was also the question of what the ILO could learn from the United Nations. Human rights were universal and applied everywhere, as the present humanitarian intervention on the international agenda demonstrated. Referring back to the discussion at the February 1993 Session of the Governing Body on the link between technical cooperation and standards, he declared that the defence and promotion of human rights should be part of the ILO's programmes of direct assistance. He recalled the motto of the World Conference on Human Rights, at present being held in Vienna: Know your rights, demand your rights, defend your rights.

323. The Government member of France indicated that the contribution the ILO made in the defence and promotion of human rights was an original one, and that any opportunity for increasing the special method practised by the ILO should be taken. Preambular paragraph 2 was important because it talked about trade union rights. Unlike other organizations, the ILO, with its tripartite structure, gave governments, employers and workers a voice in defending these rights and in reporting those who violated them, and it should be recognized for its original contribution in this domain.

324. The Workers' member of Nicaragua declared that in her country, and in Central America as a whole, human rights, including freedom of association and the rights of women, were violated daily in a violent manner. She appealed to democratic governments to consolidate democracy as a basis for consolidating human rights. The ILO played an important role in helping to ensure freedom of association, which was one of the fundamental human rights. In her country the export processing zone was growing, and with its growth there was an increase in abuses against freedom of association, human rights and women's rights. For example, women were forced to provide a certificate showing that they were not pregnant, and even to prove that they were menstruating. This was a clear violation of their right to work and was impossible to accept. Throughout Central America the situation was dramatic, with workers being imprisoned and assassinated. These countries would lose faith in organizations such as the ILO unless they spoke out against the abuses. The resolution should give full recognition to cases such as that in Nicaragua, where unemployment thrust human rights to one side. She also appealed to the Committee for the situation she had described to be fully reflected in the report, as reports to the International Labour Conference frequently did not reflect the conditions which many people had to suffer. The Organization would give a rightful place to human rights and should help supervise the building up of basic democracies in these areas.

325. The Government member of the United Kingdom informed the Committee that her Government had given high priority to this resolution in the ballot, and she regretted that the present session had not had time to consider it fully, even though the discussion might have been a difficult one. As the World Conference on Human Rights in Vienna had not yet finished, it would be appropriate to return to the subject in 1994. She saw no particular problems with the text as it stood. She welcomed the idea of closer cooperation with other organizations, as she considered action against the violation of basic human rights as the most important task of the ILO. She regretted the intervention of the Workers' member of the United Kingdom, which she judged to be inaccurate and inappropriate in this forum.

326. The Government member of Argentina, supporting the views of the previous speaker in her belief that action against the violation of basic human rights was the most important task of the ILO, stated his Government's general agreement with the text of the resolution under discussion, and hoped that it would come up for full discussion in 1994. The ILO had a particular part to play in human rights through its defence of trade union rights in particular. Action on behalf of trade union rights, the equality of women and the elimination of child labour were major tasks for the future.

327. The Employers' Vice-Chairman expressed his disquiet over the broad interpretation some of the previous speakers had given to the title and text of the resolution. His group had examined both title and text in good faith and was in favour of it. However, if the present debate was indicative of that which would take place next year, he would anticipate problems, for he detected a tendency on the part of some of the speakers to create an alternative committee on freedom of association. Although he was sympathetic to hearing about individual cases by way of example, it would be more productive if the Committee concentrated on the general principles of the text. Indeed, if the same resolution came up in 1994, his group would expect the discussion to focus on the substance of the subject given in the title.

328. The Workers' Vice-Chairman said that he could draw constructive conclusions for the future from the discussion. There was a consensus on the importance of this item and it might therefore be appropriate for the International Labour Conference to have a resolution on this theme in 1994, when the Committee could return to the discussion. The debate itself was useful, as monitoring of abuses of human rights could only be carried out through specific examples. The combination of general principles and specific, illustrative cases served to improve behaviour. Turning to the form of the resolution, as there had been complaints in the past about lengthy texts, the authors of the resolution had made the text short in an attempt to focus on the operative part. However, it was also true that short drafts inevitably left something out. He acknowledged the point of the Employers' Vice-Chairman that a more authoritative source than the Director-General's Report, Human rights - A common responsibility, could be found. To the suggestion that the draft text concentrated too much on trade union rights, he replied that these were an integral part of human rights but it was perfectly possible and acceptable to expand the draft text to take into account the position and concerns of all constituents of the ILO. It had been said that operative paragraph 1 was premature, but it would no longer be premature in 1994. This issue, and others, would continue to be studied for possible draft resolutions for the 1994 International Labour Conference.

329. The Government member of Sweden would have liked to see the resolution considered at the present session of the Committee, and had no particular problems with the text. He would also have wished the resolution on the role of the ILO in the elimination of child labour to be discussed. Referring to the remarks made by the Workers' member of Nicaragua, he believed that it was necessary to take decisions which were relevant to those who really needed help. If the resolution was submitted next year, he hoped that broader consultation before its presentation would ensure its rapid adoption.

330. The Government member of Mexico paid tribute to the interventions made by members of the Workers' group. She had found the Committee's discussion most constructive.

331. The Government member of Spain informed the Committee that her Government, like the Government of Sweden, would have preferred to see the present resolution on human rights and the resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the elimination of child labour come higher in the list of priorities for discussion.

332. The draft resolution was discussed but, for lack of time, it was not possible to set a deadline for the submission of amendments.

Consideration of the report

333. The Committee considered its draft report at its Tenth Sitting.

334. Corrections to specific paragraphs were submitted by various members for incorporation in the report.

Adoption of the report

335. At its Tenth Sitting the Committee unanimously adopted its report subject to a number of changes.

RESOLUTION SUBMITTED TO THE CONFERENCE

Resolution concerning social protection and the alleviation of unemployment and poverty, and the social dimension of structural adjustment and transition to a market economy

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling the Preamble to the Constitution of the ILO which stipulates that universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice,

Further recalling the Declaration of Philadelphia which states that poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere,

Stating that social protection is a right which should be enjoyed by every member of society,

Noting the Report of the Director-General to the present session of the Conference, entitled Social insurance and social protection, which identifies joint prerequisites for the development of social protection programmes, including full employment, steady economic growth, the existence of functioning financial markets and institutions, stable and democratic political structures, good governance and administration and, above all, a social consensus which supports the redistribution of income,

Considering that the social and living conditions of people become particularly vulnerable during periods of profound political and economic change,

Considering the problems arising out of poverty, inadequate social security coverage and limited access to health care,

Recognizing that high unemployment has a particularly adverse effect on social protection, including pension schemes and unemployment benefits,

Convinced that economic efficiency and growth, and their interaction with adequate social protection, are important prerequisites for successful national development, and that economic reforms should also lead to sustainable social progress,

Noting with concern the constraints faced particularly by developing countries such as an adverse economic environment and limited resources that constitute major impediments to full realization of a comprehensive and viable social protection scheme,

Underlining the importance of the efforts exercised by countries implementing structural adjustment programmes, particularly developing countries, and regretting in this context the adverse effects those programmes have in many cases entailed for social protection,

Convinced also that the alleviation of poverty is closely linked to the need to promote full, freely chosen and productive employment and that the application of all relevant international labour standards has an important contribution to make in countering unemployment and exclusion, and helping disadvantaged groups, Recognizing that the main responsibility for establishing a suitable legal framework for social protection rests with governments, and noting the importance of dialogue and cooperation between governments and employers' and workers' organizations in formulating and carrying out relevant policies,

Stressing the specific mandate of the ILO to contribute to the promotion and strengthening of social justice, and that its assistance would be particularly useful in situations of structural adjustment,

Welcoming the proposal that the alleviation of poverty should be one of the priority objectives of the ILO's programme of activities for 1994-95,

Emphasizing the central role which the ILO should play in the preparation, convening and follow-up of the 1995 World Summit for Social Development, where both employment and the alleviation of poverty are core issues;

1. Invites governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organizations:

(a) to take adequate measures for creating favourable conditions for social dialogue, particularly in the course of structural adjustment;

(b) to ensure that economic and structural reforms are carried out with due regard to the interests of all sectors of the population, and measures are taken to protect workers to the extent possible against the adverse effects of structural change, including by establishing appropriate mechanisms, such as vocational training and skills development programmes, for assisting those affected by structural adjustment;

(c) to make the alleviation of poverty and unemployment, and the need to promote job creation, principal goals of their economic and social policy, and to encourage policies which are in accordance with the principles of equality of opportunity and treatment and which reduce exclusion and marginalization;

(d) to develop, with the participation of workers' and employers' organizations, as appropriate, policies for economic growth and employment generation which will contribute to the strengthening of social protection systems, especially for the most vulnerable groups of the population;

(e) to integrate social protection measures in the initiation, design and implementation of structural adjustment programmes and programmes of transition to a market economy by taking into account their impact on employment, incomes, poverty and the well-being of the whole population;

(f) to extend social protection as an important element of a wider economic and social development strategy with a view to providing a basic income to all in need of social protection and establishing social assistance mechanisms to alleviate the consequences of poverty;

(g) to promote social protection schemes, based on the principles of insurance, solidarity and shared responsibility, with the participation of employers' and workers' organizations;

(h) to review their economic and social policies in the light of their contribution to the eradication of unemployment and the promotion of full, freely chosen and productive employment through sustained economic growth and development, and having regard to the principles of all relevant international labour standards;

(i) to continue to promote tripartite cooperation in the World Summit for Social Development, and all other appropriate forums, in advancing the goals stated above.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to give special importance to social protection for the population and particularly for the most vulnerable groups in the implementation of the ILO's programme of work and the planning of future activities;

(b) to promote advisory services and technical cooperation which are necessary for the development of mechanisms of social protection in developing countries and those countries which have embarked on the transition to a market economy or are engaged in the process of structural adjustment, and to analyse their effectiveness in improving social protection in these countries;

(c) to assist governments in incorporating programmes of social protection in their economic, labour market and social development policies;

(d) to provide advice and assistance to the governments of member States in elaborating and updating their social legislation;

(e) to collect, make known and exchange, on a regular basis, information on the measures taken in member States as regards social protection during periods of structural adjustment, and to promote research on social and economic needs, demographic trends and methods for financing social protection;

(f) to ensure that the problems of poverty, exclusion and unemployment, and the need to promote job creation and access to employment and social protection for disadvantaged groups, are given due attention in the preparation of the Second High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment;

(g) to develop, intensify and institutionalize close cooperation with the international financial institutions such as the IMF, the World Bank, the regional reconstruction and development banks and other international bodies concerned with a view to having their programmes of assistance take into account the need for social protection, and thus contribute to mitigating the adverse effects of structural adjustment programmes;

(h) to monitor closely the contribution of ILO activities to the alleviation of poverty, which is one of the priority objectives in the 1994-95 programme, and to present a final evaluation at the end of the biennium, with appropriate proposals concerning research and analysis, technical cooperation, standards and other ILO work;

(i) to take measures to ensure the essential contribution of the ILO, through its tripartite structure, in the preparation, convening and follow-up of the World Summit for Social Development, giving particular emphasis to issues within the scope of the mandate of the ILO, which include the elimination of poverty, the promotion of full, freely chosen and productive employment, social protection and freedom of association.

International Labour Conference
Eightieth Session, Geneva, 1993

Fifth item on the agenda: Part-time Work

Report of the Committee on Part-time Work

1. The Committee on Part-time Work was set up by the International Labour Conference at its first sitting on 2 June 1993. It was originally composed of 141 members (54 Government members, 43 Employers' members and 44 Workers' members). To achieve equality of voting strength, each Government member with the right to vote was allotted 946 votes, each Employers' member 1,100 votes and each Workers' member 1,075 votes. The composition of the Committee was modified 9 times during the session and the number of votes attributed to each member was adjusted accordingly[1].

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairperson: Mr. M. Rood (Government member, Netherlands).

Vice-Chairpersons: Mr. B. Noakes (Employers' member, Australia); and Mrs. I. Van de Burg (Workers' member, Netherlands).

Reporter: Mrs. L. Samuel (Government member, Cyprus).

3. At its fifth sitting the Committee appointed a Drafting Committee composed of the following members: Mrs. L. Caron (Government member, Canada), Mr. B. Noakes (Employers' member, Australia), Mrs. I. Van de Burg (Workers member, Netherlands) and the Reporter of the Committee.

4. The Committee held 12 sittings. It had before it Reports V (1) and V (2), prepared by the Office on the fifth item of the agenda of the Conference: "Part-time Work".

Introduction

5. The representative of the Secretary-General presented Reports V (1) and V (2), which had been prepared by the Office to serve as a basis for the Committee's discussions, and in particular the Proposed Conclusions at the end of Report V (2). Part-time work had been identified as a possible subject for the adoption of new standards by the Working Group on International Labour Standards set up by the Governing Body of the ILO in 1984. In effect, with few exceptions, ILO Conventions and Recommendations did not refer directly to part-time work. The work of the Committee therefore provided an opportunity to adopt a global approach to the various aspects of a form of employment which already concerned tens of millions of workers in the industrialized countries. Although it was less common in the developing countries, it was present there and was likely to take on greater importance in the years to come.

6. In this context, the representative of the Secretary-General noted that a relatively high number of the replies received to the questionnaire contained in Report V (1) had been from Governments in developing countries, which revealed their interest in the issue of part-time work. Including the replies which had been received too late to be summarized in Report V (2), a total of 77 Governments had responded to the questionnaire, as well as national employers' and workers' organizations from over 30 countries.

7. Turning to the Proposed Conclusions, the representative of the Secretary-General referred to a number of important points. With reference to the form to be taken by the proposed standards, he noted that 90 per cent of Governments had recognized in their replies to the questionnaire that it was appropriate to adopt international labour standards on part-time work. Around 60 per cent of Governments had supported the proposal to adopt a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.

8. In view of the need to specify clearly the category of workers to be covered by the new standards, the definition of part-time work was of fundamental

[1] The following adjustments were made:

(a) 4 June. 175 members (70 Government members with 28 votes each, 49 Employers' members with 40 votes each and 56 Workers' members with 35 votes each);

(b) 7 June: 172 members (72 Government members with 25 votes each, 50 Employers' members with 36 votes each and 50 Workers' members with 36 votes each);

(c) 8 June: 174 members (73 Government members with 2,550 votes each, 50 Employers' members with 3,723 votes each and 51 Workers' members with 3,650 votes each);

(d) 10 June: 174 members (75 Government members with 98 votes each, 49 Employers' members with 150 votes each and 50 Workers' members with 147 votes each);

(e) 11 June: 172 members (75 Government members with 784 votes each, 49 Employers' members with [illegible]0 votes each and 48 Workers' members with 1,225 votes each);

(f) 14 June: 169 members (75 Government members with 147 votes each, 49 Employers members' with 225 votes each and 45 Workers' members with 245 votes each);

(g) 15 June: 171 members (75 Government members with 2,303 votes each, 49 Employers' members with 3,525 votes each and 47 Workers' members with 3,675 votes each);

(h) 16 June: 170 members (76 Government members with 47 votes each, 47 Employers' members with 76 votes each and 47 Workers' members with 76 votes each); importance. There was a tendency to group part-time workers with other categories of workers whose employment situation was considered to be unusual or atypical, although it had not been the intention of the Governing Body when placing this item on the agenda of the Conference to cover issues such as temporary, casual or seasonal work. The Committee's work would not therefore deal with workers in temporary, casual or seasonal employment relationships, unless their hours of work were less than those of full-time workers in the same employment relationship. Following the comments which had been received on the subject of the definition of part-time work originally proposed in the questionnaire, the Office had endeavoured to put forward a simpler definition which made fewer demands on the competent authority, while covering all the possible forms of part-time work in terms of hours worked and working time arrangements.

(i) 18 June: 162 members (76 Government members with 1,833 votes each, 47 Employers' members with 2,964 votes each, 39 Workers' members with 3,572 votes each).

9. Another important question concerned the scope of the new standards. The only exclusion proposed by the Office in its questionnaire had concerned limited categories of workers or of enterprises when the application of the standards to them would raise special problems of a substantial nature.The responses to this point of the questionnaire had been contradictory. Some had held that the new standards should apply to all part-time workers without exception, while others had suggested broader exclusions, even including certain occupations in which part-time workers were particularly numerous.

10. With reference to the relationship between the proposed new standards on part-time work and other ILO standards, the representative of the Secretary-General noted that the fear had been expressed that a Convention which specifically covered part-time workers could prejudice the rights conferred upon them by other ILO Conventions. The Office had therefore included point 4 in the Proposed Conclusions, which provided that the standards to be adopted on part-time work should not affect more favourable provisions applicable to such workers under other international labour standards. Moreover, several points in the Proposed Conclusions had been modified in order to ensure that the envisaged Convention did not call into question the application to part-time workers of the principle of equality of protection and treatment which were set out in a general manner in other ILO Conventions.

11. When including part-time work on the agenda of the Conference, the Governing Body had assigned the double objective of examining both the protection of part-time workers and the promotion of part-time work. The Proposed Conclusions for the Convention and Recommendation therefore contained provisions covering both of these objectives. With regard to the protection of part-time workers, points 7 and 8 specified that they should be afforded the same protection as other workers in the fields of freedom of association and collective bargaining, occupational safety and health, non-discrimination in employment and occupation and wage rates. The measures proposed in points 9 and 10 called for part-time workers to enjoy equivalent conditions in the fields of social security, maternity protection, termination of employment, and paid annual leave and public holidays, on the understanding that the relevant conditions could be determined in proportion to hours of work or contributions. Through these suggested measures, the Office had wished to demonstrate that the objective was not to create a type of reverse discrimination to the detriment of full-time workers and that there was not necessarily a contradiction between the proportional calculation of the entitlements of part-time workers and their equality of treatment in respect of other workers.

12. A final controversial point concerned the thresholds proposed in point 11. The text of the Proposed Conclusions had undergone substantial modification in that respect in order to guarantee that the existence of such thresholds did not result in the exclusion of a significant proportion of part-time workers. It should be noted that application of the thresholds would give rise to a triple obligation: to review the thresholds periodically; to indicate to the ILO the thresholds in force, the reasons therefor and the action taken to extend progressively protection to the workers excluded; and to consult the most representative organizations of employers and workers in the case of the establishment or revision of the thresholds.

13. In conclusion, the representative of the Secretary-General indicated that one of the principal concerns of the Office in formulating the Proposed Conclusions had been to find wording which was sufficiently flexible to be acceptable to the Conference Committee and which took into account the diversity of the economic and social conditions prevailing in the member States of the ILO.

General discussion

14. Introducing the position of the Workers' group on the proposed standards on part-time work, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson noted that part-time work was a form of employment which was already widespread and was growing rapidly. It existed in many forms and under many conditions in the industrialized countries, but was also appearing in the developing countries. In the OECD countries alone, the number of part-time workers was estimated at 60 million, over two-thirds of whom were women. She emphasized that in the view of the Workers' members, taking into account the contents of existing ILO instruments such as the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), the Employment Policy Recommendation, 1964 (No. 122) and the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156), part-time work was an employment phenomenon which could not be overlooked in the context of international labour standards. The underlying principle for the discussion of part-time work was the need for freely chosen and productive employment for all workers. This required the adoption of a proper employment policy in member States, incorporating part-time work, and active labour market policies to promote high quality, well-paid and stable employment in general. These policies should incorporate equal treatment, full protection and equal opportunities for all workers, irrespective of their working hours, with regard to all components of labour relations, such as access to employment, working conditions, health and safety and workers' rights. Moreover, it was a fundamental principle that part-time work should only result from the free choices of workers. This meant that it should not be forced upon them because of a lack of full-time employment opportunities, nor should it create a dual labour market in which competition between full- and part-time workers had the effect of leading to a general deterioration in the working conditions of the labour force as a whole.

15. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson added that current practices concerning part-time work varied widely from country to country, with the legislation and collective agreements sometimes applying fully to part-time workers, sometimes not at all, and sometimes only in part or proportionally. The ILO had therefore taken a very useful initiative in attempting to set an overall standard on this subject, notwithstanding the fact that in principle general ILO standards applied to all categories of workers, unless they were explicitly excluded, irrespective of the number of hours they worked. The Workers' members therefore strongly supported the adoption of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. Turning to the question of the promotion of part-time work, she believed that at a time when full protection and opportunities for part-time workers had not been achieved, the introduction of provisions to promote this form of employment would be premature and even objectionable, particularly since part-time work in many countries was almost synonymous with casual and marginalized labour under inferior conditions. Nevertheless, in order to maximize the possibility of achieving consensus, the Workers' members would seek possibilities of reconciling the protection and promotion of part-time work in an adequate manner. The main objective of the standards was to define the elementary rights and principles for part-time workers. Their protection and equal treatment should therefore be covered in clear and substantial, although not necessarily detailed, provisions.

16. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson reminded the Committee that the subject of part-time work had been included on the agenda of the Conference as a result of a decision by the Governing Body which had not been supported by the Employers' Group and about which it had expressed serious reservations. He also noted that, in accordance with the Governing Body's decision, the item included both the protection and the promotion of part-time work. Furthermore, it had not been the intention of the Governing Body for the item to cover temporary, casual or seasonal work.

17. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized the importance taken on by part-time work in modern economies, where its growth was a result of structural changes, including the rise of the service industries, which required a high degree of flexibility in their operations in order to meet consumer demand. Part-time work had also increased as a result of the complexity of many industries, which required continuous or extended operations involving complex work schedules. Part-time work suited the preferences of many workers, including students, young persons in general, men and women who sought work patterns which suited their chosen lifestyle, workers with family responsibilities, persons approaching retirement and others who had retired from full-time work. Employers attempted to provide a choice of working time arrangements for their workforce in order to attract and retain workers. Other reasons for the growth of part-time work included the growing importance of small businesses, particularly in the services sector, and their requirement of flexibility in their operations, as well as the pressing need for greater productivity and efficiency in order to remain competitive. In a general environment of recession and reduced business activity, part-time work provided employment opportunities which would not otherwise be available. It was also useful in providing work experience, particularly for young persons, and gave workers in general a better chance of gradually gaining access to full-time employment if they so wished. For all these reasons, the barriers to part-time work should be dismantled and this form of employment should be promoted and encouraged.

18. In this context, the Employers' members were firmly opposed to the adoption of a Convention on part-time work, which they believed would give rise to inevitable rigidities, inflexibilities and additional costs. Such an instrument would be seriously counterproductive in terms of employment and would deny workers the choice of working time arrangements and employers the freedom to organize the work of their staff in a more productive manner. Part-time work, which had grown surprisingly rapidly in many countries, met the needs of both employers and workers in a modern economy and was a consensual arrangement. It was a legitimate form of work which had characteristics that distinguished it from other forms of non-full-time work. One of these was the concept of an employment relationship which had a significant degree of continuity and contained a prior understanding concerning the work to be done and the period over which it was to be performed. Although the Employers' members supported the fair treatment of part-time workers, they opposed the adoption of standards which had no relevance or justification and which could only lead to the loss of part-time jobs and of employment opportunities in general. Moreover, it was unacceptable for the ILO to adopt standards which concerned almost exclusively the industrialized countries, and particularly those in Western Europe. A Convention of the sort now proposed would receive no support from employers and would be adopted against their opposition. It would have little or no relevance to the present needs of the majority of ILO member States and would remain largely unratified and unimplemented. The proposed texts failed to address the need to eliminate the barriers to part-time work which often prevented its full development. Furthermore, the proposed definition of part-time work had the effect of encompassing all workers who were not full-time employees, and therefore included casual, temporary and seasonal workers, despite the fact that it had not been the Governing Body's intention for the proposed standards to cover these categories of workers. The definition of part-time work was central to the whole discussion and it would not be easy to arrive at an appropriate solution. The Proposed Conclusions would therefore have to be substantially amended if they were to be at all acceptable to the Employers' members.

19. The Government member of Nigeria said that part-time work was not a common phenomenon in the developing countries. He believed that a Convention and a Recommendation on the subject should confine themselves to laying down basic guidelines and principles for the protection of part-time workers. It was necessary to ensure that these guidelines did not make it more advantageous for employers to engage part-time rather than full-time workers, nor should they cause employers to abandon part-time work.

20. The Government member of Antigua and Barbuda noted that concerns relating to part-time work differed from one country to another. In his country, the Labour Code did not refer to part-time workers at all. He warned of the dangers of making distinctions between categories of the labour force. All workers, irrespective of their hours of work, should be entitled to benefits such as sick leave, holidays and social security. In the case of part-time workers, the hourly rate of pay should be the same as for their full-time colleagues. He hoped that the instruments adopted would not deteriorate the situation of part-time workers in his country.

21. The Government member of Turkey noted that part-time work was increasing both in industrialized and developing countries and that for this reason it was necessary to have international instruments on part-time work. He would favour a Convention containing flexible provisions making it easier to take into account differences in the economic and social situation of ILO member States. He would also favour a Recommendation complementing the Convention.

22. The Government member of Sweden agreed that the role of the Committee should be to formulate standards which were universally relevant and applicable. She noted with concern that Report V (1) had hardly offered a single reference to part-time work in the developing countries. It was therefore with satisfaction that she had learnt that Governments from all parts of the world had replied to the Office questionnaire. She pointed out that part-time workers were already covered by the Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO which were of general applicability. Not one instrument specifically excluded them. However, these standards had not been drafted with the specific aim of addressing the obstacles to part-time work or the specific needs for protection of part-time workers. Nevertheless, many of the standards which had already been adopted took on special importance for part-time workers, the great majority of whom were women. This was particularly true of the instruments relating to discrimination, equal remuneration and workers with family responsibilities.

23. The Government member of Sweden added that in her view a new instrument on part-time work, if any were adopted, should take the form of a Recommendation. A Convention with the form envisaged in the questionnaire could actually entail a risk of excluding part-time workers from the scope of general ILO Conventions, or of detracting from their application to part-time work. This would not only be detrimental to part-time workers, but would also undermine the previous instruments. It would be preferable for the ILO, when monitoring the effect given to its other Conventions, to focus its attention on the situation of part-time workers. If, however, a Convention were to be adopted, her delegation believed that it should only lay down fundamental principles aimed at equality of protection and treatment for part-time workers, and that any detailed guidelines should be contained in the Recommendation. Although the Office had included in its Proposed Conclusions a provision specifying that standards on part-time work should not affect more favourable provisions applicable to part-time workers under other international labour standards, this did not meet her full concern. In her view, an explicit reference should be made in a preambular paragraph of the new instruments to the fact that the ILO had adopted standards of general applicability which covered part-time workers and that their application to part-timers should be ensured.

24. The Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, noted that the Member States of the European Communities had a certain experience with legislation relating to part-time work. Most Member States of the European Communities were in favour of a Convention which contained some minimum standards, and which left room for collective bargaining. However, the content of any instruments which were adopted should take into account the problems and needs of developing countries.

25. However, the Government member of the United Kingdom did not consider that the adoption of international standards in the field of part-time work would be helpful. Moreover, the issues covered in the proposed instruments were largely irrelevant to developing countries, which nevertheless made up the majority of the member States of the ILO. They were also counter to the interests of both the employers and workers, since they limited the flexibility of employers and jeopardized the employment of part-time workers. There was a fundamental inconsistency between the promotion of part-time work and the raising of barriers to it through the adoption of protective measures. If a Recommendation were to be adopted, it should take into account the needs of all member States.

26. The Government member of Germany considered that part-time work presented various advantages for both employers and workers. From the employer's point of view, the increased productivity and flexibility of part-time work compensated for its various organizational disadvantages. In a situation in which there was a limited volume of employment, it could be instrumental in easing the labour market by sharing out the available work. It offered the possibility for new entrants to the labour market to gradually become integrated into the world of work and also gave them the opportunity to continue their studies while working at the same time. In particular, it responded to the needs of women workers with family responsibilities. Women currently accounted for 90 per cent of part-time workers in his country, although the rate for men would undoubtedly increase once they learnt to share family duties. He emphasized that part-time workers should have the same rights and duties as full-time workers, in fields such as the termination of the employment relationship and holiday entitlements. He welcomed this opportunity for the adoption of standards, which could contribute to ensuring that part-time work was no longer considered to be second-rate employment.

27. The Government member of the United States added that part-time work was also a phenomenon of increasing importance in his country, alongside various other forms of contingent employment. Although they provided greater flexibility in the labour market, these forms of employment resulted in lower wages and a loss of various fringe benefits. While a significant component of part-time work was voluntary, in the sense that it was desired by both workers and employers, over the past two decades two-thirds of the increase in this form of employment had been involuntary. His country, as well as many other countries, therefore faced the challenge of developing and implementing new policies which could begin to eliminate the adverse effects of these forms of employment, while maintaining the necessary flexibility in the labour market. The Committee's discussions would therefore provide specific guidance to member States and would highlight the importance of dealing with the adverse effects of contingent forms of employment. His country shared the fundamental commitment of ensuring that all workers had access to the necessary level of social protection and benefits, irrespective of whether they worked full- or part-time.

28. In response to the remarks of the previous speaker, the Employers' member of the United States said that the situation of part-time workers in his country was not as negative as it had been portrayed. The major reason for its growth had been the rise in the participation rate of women on the labour market. Many part-time workers were professional and technical workers and were well-paid. Moreover, under his country's legislation, part-time workers could be covered by collective bargaining and had been included in a number of collective agreements.

Consideration of the Proposed Conclusions contained in Report V (2)

A. FORM OF THE INSTRUMENTS

29. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete Point 1. They believed that the adoption of standards on part-time work was not an appropriate manner for the ILO to address the relationship between part-time work and the general economic and social situation in the world today. Part-time work was an indispensable component of the labour force in many economies, particularly in the industrialized countries. It gave employers greater flexibility to adapt their activities to market demands and it increased job opportunities by providing work in circumstances which would not otherwise be possible. In a situation of universally depressed economic and business activity, unemployment and poverty, it was important that the ILO's activities should be directed principally towards the promotion of employment rather than the setting of standards. In this context, it was particularly ironic that the proposed standards, by introducing inflexibilities and rigidities in relation to part-time work, could have a negative impact on the needs of the workers by making jobs disappear. This was particularly inappropriate at a time when the Fourth Human Development Report of the United Nations Development Programme had stated that unemployment was the issue of the 1990s and that the fundamental key to change was job creation. Moreover, the preparatory work was not sufficient to permit the adoption of new standards on part-time work. The Office reports had concentrated on the situation in the industrialized countries, and in Western Europe in particular. ILO standards should be universal in character and there was something fundamentally wrong in attempting to adopt standards which concerned only a small group of countries.

30. In reply, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson expressed the conviction of the Workers' members that standard-setting was not in any way obsolete and emphasized the important contribution that it made to improving the situation of workers and achieving general economic progress. She also reminded the Committee that the decision of the Governing Body to include an item on part-time work on the agenda of the Conference had been taken unanimously. It would therefore be very unusual for the Conference to take a decision at this stage not to examine the proposed instruments. It was important that the Conference adopted standards on part-time work which contributed to ensuring the rights of all workers, and particularly this increasingly important category of the labour force. She also emphasized that it was clear that there was broad support from the developing countries for the proposed instruments. Standards on part-time work anticipated the future development of this form of employment in those countries. The Workers' member of Sri Lanka confirmed that part-time work was an increasingly important phenomenon in developing countries and said that it often emerged following structural adjustments. The problem should not be ignored. It was the role of the ILO to set minimum standards in order to guarantee fundamental rights and protection. These standards needed to be sufficiently flexible to apply to both the developing and the industrialized countries.

31. A number of Government speakers opposed the amendment. The Government member of Canada agreed with the Employers' Vice-Chairperson that the problem of unemployment was particularly serious and a matter of great concern to most Governments. However, part-time work was an extraordinarily topical issue and there was a need to address it through international labour standards. It was the firm view of her delegation that it was important to adopt a Convention which focused on broad general principles of general applicability. The Government member of Cyprus added that the time was appropriate for the adoption of standards on part-time work, and that they should be flexible enough to be acceptable to most countries. The Government member of the United States emphasized the fundamental importance of the continued enactment and implementation of international labour standards in achieving sustainable economic growth throughout the world. Employment growth which was achieved by the utilization of workers in violation of fair and equitable labour standards would inevitably lead to a rise in protectionist pressures in the major industrialized countries. This would in turn lead to an erosion of the world trading system which was so essential to sustainable global economic expansion.

32. The Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Governments of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, supported the adoption of standards on part-time work and therefore opposed the amendment. The Government member of Switzerland added that such standards needed to be flexible. The Government member of Turkey emphasized that part-time work was taking on importance in the developing countries and that the issue should be covered by international labour standards.

33. The amendment was rejected by a vote of 2,032 in favour and 3,388 against.

34. Point 1 was adopted without change.

35. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment to delete the point.

36. The Employers' members and the Government members of Indonesia, Japan, Malaysia and Sweden all submitted amendments to delete the words "Convention supplemented by a". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the arguments which he had advanced for the previous point had even greater force on the question of the adoption of a Convention, which by its nature imposed binding obligations and would therefore certainly lead to inflexibilities, rigidities and a decline in job opportunities. The ILO would be much better able to promote part-time work through the adoption of a Recommendation than a Convention. Moreover, it would not be appropriate to adopt a Convention based on background reports which were largely confined to the situation in the industrialized countries. If a Convention were to be adopted it would be in the face of strong opposition by employers and would be largely unratified and unimplemented. This would be a waste of ILO time and resources which were sorely needed for the alleviation of poverty, rather than for the adoption of instruments which would obstruct the creation of jobs.

37. The Government members who had submitted identical amendments believed that the flexibility required in the proposed instruments on part-time work would be more effectively met by the format of a Recommendation than a Convention. The Government member of Indonesia pointed out that part-time work was a new phenomenon in his country, although some workers had to work shorter hours due to a temporary lack of demand. This problem mainly affected workers in the informal sector. Developing countries therefore needed information and guidelines for dealing with the issue, but not binding obligations. The Government member of Japan, also speaking on behalf of the Government member of Sweden, noted that existing ILO Conventions also covered part-time workers. Since many part-time workers were women, standards such as the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), and the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156), were particularly relevant to their situation. The Government member of Malaysia also warned that, due to their differing circumstances and needs, developing countries with a high rate of unemployment would find it difficult to ratify a Convention.

38. The Government members of the Philippines, Swaziland and the United Kingdom supported the above amendments. The Government member of Mexico believed that a Recommendation would enable member States to adopt measures in their own time in accordance with their national circumstances, law and practice. Such a Recommendation should contain the necessary provisions to recognize and guarantee the rights of workers, as well as the flexibility inherent in part-time work. The Government member of Antigua and Barbuda warned that the issue of part-time work had so many controversial aspects that this was not the appropriate time for the adoption of a Convention.

39. However, other Government members opposed the amendment. The Government member of the United States emphasized that international labour Conventions played a key role in achieving better labour standards throughout the world. The Government member of Norway and the Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Governments of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, supported the adoption of both a Convention and a Recommendation. The Government member of Cyprus, agreeing with the above speakers, informed the Committee that part-time work was also a growing phenomenon in less developed countries and that it was only equitable for part-time workers to be treated in the same way as their full-time colleagues. The Government member of Senegal agreed that part-time work was sufficiently important to warrant the adoption of a Convention which could be widely ratified and would receive tripartite support in its implementation. The Government members of the Czech Republic and Chile emphasized the need to adopt a flexible Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.

40. The amendments submitted by the Employers' members and the Government members of Indonesia, Japan, Malaysia, and Sweden were rejected by a vote of 2,464 in favour and 2,856 against, with 28 abstentions.

41. Point 2 was adopted without change.

Addition of new Points relating to a preamble after Point 2

42. An amendment submitted by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Japan, Norway, Sweden and the United States sought to add the following preambular paragraph after point 2:

Recognizing the general applicability of ILO standards to part-time workers and the special relevance of the provisions of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951, the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958, and the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981.

43. The Workers' members also submitted an amendment to add a preambular paragraph. In addition to the above instruments, their proposal noted the provisions contained in the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984, and in the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988.

44. Introducing the first amendment, the Government member of Sweden noted that it was important to include in the Preamble to the Convention a provision which reaffirmed the general applicability of ILO standards to part-time workers and which made specific reference to those which were of particular importance to them.

45. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that, although he was not opposed to the principles underlying the two amendments, their specific wording caused some problems. In response to these concerns, the Government member of Canada proposed that the new preambular paragraph should start with the words "Taking note of the relevance, for part-time workers," in place of the words "Recognizing the general applicability of ILO standards to part-time workers and the special relevance".

46. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson indicated that she could agree with the above text provided that it also referred to the other two instruments mentioned in the amendment submitted by the Workers' members. The Government member of Canada and the Government member of Denmark, on behalf of the Governments of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, agreed with the proposed subamendments.

47. The Committee adopted a new preambular paragraph to follow point 2, which read as follows:

Taking note of the relevance, for part-time workers, of the provisions of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951, the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1981, the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981, the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984, and the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988.

48. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a further preambular paragraph:

Recognizing the importance of productive and freely chosen employment for all workers and the need to adopt policy measures to ensure that part-time workers enjoy equal opportunities and treatment in matters such as working conditions, access to employment and social security.

The Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the proposed new paragraph confined itself to established ILO language and was important in setting the context of part-time work at the beginning of the proposed instrument.

49. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that he agreed with the broad intent behind the proposed new preambular paragraph but found difficulty with some of the wording. In particular, he did not feel that the Preamble was the correct place to indicate that Governments had an obligation to adopt policy measures. The reference to equal opportunities and treatment in working conditions for part-time workers was inappropriate because the remainder of the text did not deal extensively with working conditions. Moreover, the reference to social security would probably give rise to considerable difficulties for Governments. He therefore suggested a wording to replace this part of the amendment which emphasized the economic importance of part-time work and the importance of part-time workers being able to enjoy access to employment opportunities.

50. After the Workers' Vice-Chairperson had indicated that the proposed change was too radical to be acceptable to the Workers' members, the Government member of Canada introduced a subamendment to meet the concerns of both the Employers and the Workers. The proposed wording referred to the need to ensure "equivalent" protection for part-time workers in the areas of working conditions, access to employment and social security. This proposed subamendment was supported by the Government members of the United States, Switzerland and Austria. However, the Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of Belgium, France, Denmark, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, felt that it would be preferable to discuss the matters referred to in the proposed new preambular paragraph under the substantive provisions of the proposed Convention and Recommendation. Following a brief discussion concerning the context in which the word "equivalent" was being used, the Committee agreed to further subamend the wording of the new paragraph by deleting the word "equivalent".

51. The Committee adopted the following preambular paragraph:

Recognizing the importance of productive and freely chosen employment for all workers, the need to recognize the economic importance of part-time work and the need to ensure protection for part-time workers in the areas of working conditions, access to employment and social security.

B. DEFINITION AND MEANS OF APPLICATION

52. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the text of paragraph 3 (a) by the following:

The term "part-time worker" should mean an employed person who works on a regular and customary basis under a continuing contract of employment in which the hours of work are within levels to be determined by the competent authority with reference to industry and enterprise circumstances, or by collective or voluntary agreements.

The Employers' members believed that the definition of part-time worker was fundamental and raised some very difficult issues. There had been a clear understanding when part-time work was placed on the agenda of the Conference that the proceedings of the Committee should not cover casual, temporary or seasonal work. However, the definition proposed by the Office regarded part-time workers as being persons who worked shorter hours than their full-time colleagues under any type of employment relationship. The Employers' members were convinced that part-time work differed fundamentally from casual, temporary and seasonal work and that this difference should be recognized by the exclusion of these latter categories of workers from the definition of part-time work. The amendment therefore sought to put forward a definition which recognized the essential difference between part-time work and these other forms of employment relationship by emphasizing the regular and continuous nature of part-time work. He added that many of the provisions contained later in the proposed instruments, such as those covering the termination of the employment relationship, presupposed a regular employment relationship for part-time workers.

53. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson also referred to the importance of the question of thresholds. The definition of part-time worker contained in the original questionnaire sent out by the Office had referred to thresholds. However, in order to accommodate some of the comments made in reply to the questionnaire, the Office had considered it better to address the issue of thresholds later in the proposed text and to confine them to specific subjects, such as social security. The Employers' members did not agree with this approach. The proposed amendment therefore sought to deal with the question of thresholds as an integral part of the definition of part-time workers.

54. The Government member of Australia described the situation in her country, where there were a significant number of casual employees. Their employment relationship had a distinct character and they were remunerated and protected on a different basis than workers who were covered by permanent contracts of employment. If the definition proposed by the Office were to be retained in combination with the current wording of Point 6 (1), it would be very difficult for her Government to ratify the resulting Convention. However, she also noted that it might be possible to address these problems under Point 6 of the Proposed Conclusions.

55. A number of Government members supported the amendment submitted by the Employers' members. The Government member of Malta said that the regulations in his country established an upper threshold for part-time workers and a lower threshold for full-time workers. If part-time workers were employed for more than a certain number of hours, they became full-time workers. He proposed to subamend the text proposed by the Employers' members by deleting the words "and customary" and "continuing". The Government member of Ireland considered that the text proposed by the Office would give rise to confusion in the definition of part-time workers. The definition needed to establish upper and lower limits and should refer to normal hours of work as established by national law and practice. The Government members of Ireland, Japan and the United Kingdom supported the amendment proposed by the Employers' members, as subamended by the Government member of Malta. The Government member of the United Kingdom regretted that the definition proposed by the Office did not enable workers to determine directly whether or not they were part-time workers. Moreover, it assumed that it was possible to define normal full-time hours, which in practice varied considerably, and that most workers were covered by collective bargaining and agreements.

56. The representative of the Secretary-General noted that the Governing Body, when deciding to include part-time work on the agenda of the Conference, had referred to the need to avoid dealing with all forms of atypical work in the same instrument. However, it had not specified that the instruments should deal only with permanent part-time workers. Part-time workers were covered by many different forms of employment relationship. Although certain part-time workers were evidently in a permanent employment relationship, many of them also worked on a temporary, seasonal or casual basis. The intention of the definition contained in the Proposed Conclusions had therefore been to cover all part-time workers, irrespective of their employment relationship.

57. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. They considered that the definition contained in the Proposed Conclusions had wisely avoided references to national situations and had excluded the problem of the type of employment relationship. It had also been wise of the Office to postpone treatment of the problem of thresholds until later in the proposed instrument.

58. A number of Government members also stated a preference for the text proposed by the Office. The Government member of Canada considered that the definition contained in the proposed amendment created numerous problems. By way of illustration, its reference to a contract of employment meant that the instrument would only be of limited applicability in a country such as her own in which it was neither compulsory, nor the practice for a written contract of employment to be established. The definition should cover part-time workers in general and any exceptions should be set out elsewhere in the proposed instruments. The definition proposed by the Office had the advantage of allowing the necessary flexibility in the substantive provisions of the Convention. The Government member of Cyprus, as well as the Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Governments of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, also supported the definition proposed by the Office, which they considered to be sufficiently broad and flexible. The Government member of Turkey also opposed the amendment put forward by the Employers' members.

59. The Government member of Japan considered that the basic characteristic of part-time workers was that they worked shorter hours than full-time employees. Within the framework of a broad definition, member States would be left with sufficient flexibility to determine the relevant definitions according to their policies.

60. Referring to the definition proposed by the Office, and the misunderstanding which appeared to have emerged among certain members of the Committee, the representative of the Secretary-General indicated that by employing the words "for the relevant type of work or occupation", the Office had intended that the equality of protection sought for part-time workers should be achieved by comparing what was comparable. By way of illustration, part-time workers in a seasonal employment relationship could not be compared, from the point of view of their protection, with permanent full-time workers, just as part-time workers in a permanent employment relationship could not be compared with casual workers working on a full-time basis. It was therefore within each type of employment relationship that equality between part- and full-time workers should be promoted and the objective of the new standards was not, in any event, to treat part-time workers better than full-time workers.

61. The Government member of Switzerland, noting that the text of the Convention would only attempt to compare what was comparable, also supported the definition proposed by the Office. If the Employers' amendment were to be adopted, she feared that casual, temporary and seasonal workers would be excluded from the protection provided by the instruments. She particularly welcomed the reference to weekly working hours in the text proposed by the Office.

62. After consultations between the Officers of the Committee, a compromise text was placed before the Committee for consideration in the form of an amendment submitted by the Chairperson, which sought to replace Point 3 by the following:

> For the purposes of these standards:
> (a) the term "part-time worker" should mean an employed person whose normal hours of work are less than the normal hours of work of comparable full-time workers;
> (b) the normal hours of work referred to in clause (a) may be weekly or calculated on average over a given period of employment;
> (c) the term "comparable full-time workers" used in clause (a) above and in other points of the Proposed Conclusions refers to full-time workers:
> (i) in the establishment or branch of activity concerned;
> (ii) with the same type of employment relationship and the same or a similar type of work or occupation as the part-time worker concerned;
> (d) this definition should not apply to full-time workers affected by partial unemployment, that is a collective and temporary reduction in normal hours of work for economic, technical or structural reasons.

When introducing the new text, the Chairperson drew the Committee's attention to the need, in addition to the revised definition, to amend points 7, 8, 9, 10, 18 (2), 19 (2), 20, 23 and 24, of the Proposed Conclusions by replacing the words "all other workers" or "other workers" by the words "comparable full-time workers".

63. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson welcomed the proposed text as a vast improvement which satisfied many of the concerns of the Employers. He withdrew the amendment he had proposed previously.

64. In response to a request for clarification from the Workers' Vice-Chairperson, the representative of the Secretary-General confirmed that the term "normal hours of work" employed in the proposed definition covered only the hours usually worked by a worker, and excluded overtime hours worked by full-time workers and the hours performed by part-time workers over and above their agreed working hours. He also indicated that the phrase "the same type of employment relationship" referred to workers employed under a specific type of employment relationship, such as permanent employment, as well as, in non-permanent employment, fixed-term, temporary, seasonal or casual employment relationships. Within each type of employment relationship, all part-time workers were included, irrespective of their hours of work. Following this clarification, the Workers' Vice-chairperson pointed out the Workers' concern that a mere difference in hours of work should not be sufficient to classify a part-time worker as having a different employment relationship than a full-time worker. Since the Office had agreed with the Workers on this point, she was able to support the new definition.

65. The amendment was also supported by the Government member of Canada and the Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the twelve member States of the European Communities.

66. Point 3 was adopted as amended.

Point 4

67. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words "international labour standards" by the words "ILO Conventions". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson believed that the original wording was capable of a wider definition than originally intended and might encompass instruments such as the Directives of the European Communities. Moreover, the only ILO instruments which could be considered to be "applicable" in the strict sense of the term were Conventions, which became applicable when ratified. Recommendations were not applicable in that sense.

68. The Workers' members expressed a preference for the original text, which was drafted in normal ILO language.

69. The representative of the Secretary-General noted that only the provisions of Conventions, following their ratification, had to be applied to workers who came within their scope. The amendment was therefore relevant, since the term "international labour standards" included Recommendations as well as Conventions.

70. The Government member of Canada saw little difference between the two terms, neither of which affected the obligations by member States under other treaties incorporating higher standards. The Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the twelve member States of the European Communities, considered that the amendment was acceptable.

71. Point 4 was adopted as amended.

72. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the first sentence of Point 5 by the following:

> The standards should, insofar as they are not otherwise made effective by means of collective agreements, arbitration awards or court decisions or in such a manner as may be consistent with national practice, be given effect by laws or regulations.

The Employers' Vice-Chairperson confirmed that the amendment was merely a reversal of the order of the text proposed by the Office, which started with laws and regulations and then referred to collective agreements. The language used was almost precisely the same as a provision in the Termination of Employment Convention, (No. 158) 1982, and the rationale behind the amendment was to emphasize the primacy of a negotiated approach between the social partners, which should only be followed by the adoption of laws and regulations if it were unsuccessful.

73. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson observed that Convention No. 158 was more limited in scope than the matters under examination by the Committee, which explained the emphasis placed in that Convention on collective bargaining as a means of applying its provisions. The question of part-time work was broader and the Office's text, which placed emphasis on legislation, was therefore preferable.

74. The Government members of Canada and the United Kingdom saw little difference between the two texts. However, the Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Greece, Italy, Portugal and Spain, rejected the amendment as adding nothing new.

75. The representative of the Secretary-General indicated that the only difference between the Offices text and the amendment proposed by the Employers' members was that in the former emphasis was placed on legislation as a means of applying the provisions of the proposed Convention, whereas in the latter it was placed on collective bargaining. What mattered in practice was that the provisions of the Convention were strictly applied and the order of the means used for this purpose had very little importance.

76. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson did not wish to cause a vote to be taken and therefore withdrew the amendment.

77. The Government members of Denmark and Germany submitted an amendment to insert the following sentence after the first sentence:

> For the members where the provisions of this Convention are matters normally left to agreements between employers or employers' organizations and workers' organizations, compliance with those provisions shall be treated as effective if they are applied through such agreements to the great majority of the workers concerned.

The Government member of Denmark, supported by the Government member of Germany, said that the amendment had been submitted in view of the special characteristics of the system of collective bargaining in Denmark and Germany. The great majority of workers in these two countries were covered by collective agreements, although some were not. The proposed amendment would make it possible to ratify the Convention. The same language was contained in the Working Conditions (Hotels and Restaurants) Convention, 1991 (No. 172). The Government member of Germany added that between 70 and 80 per cent of workers were covered by collective agreements in his country. To adopt legislation covering the other workers who are not member of trade unions, would be in contradiction with the principle of the autonomy of the social partners.

78. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson said that the Convention should encompass all part-time workers, and not only those covered by collective agreements. The proposed language would have the effect of diminishing the obligation of governments in certain member States to take measures to apply the Convention. She therefore opposed the amendment.

79. The Government member of Canada also opposed the amendment and pointed out that the original text of Point 5 covered the concerns expressed by the authors of the amendment. In many countries, such as her own, collective agreements applied to a fairly small proportion of workers, unlike those States in which there was a nationwide system of collective bargaining. The Government member of Cyprus also preferred the Office's text, which she considered to be sufficiently flexible to take account of the concerns of the Government members of Denmark and Germany.

80. The representative of the Secretary-General noted that although the language used in the Working Conditions (Hotels and Restaurants) Convention, (No. 172) 1991, was similar to the wording proposed in the amendment, that Convention only covered workers in a particular sector. In such a case, it was more likely that agreements could be concluded covering all or nearly all of the workers in concerned. This was not true of the proposed instruments on part-time work, which would cover all branches of activity, and therefore situations which were very different regarding collective bargaining. He also pointed out that the Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149), which also covered a specific sector, did not contain similar language because the workers concerned were employed by both the public sector and private enterprises and were therefore covered by different conditions of employment.

81. The Government member of Austria considered that the amendment came close to providing that in certain circumstances Governments which ratified the Convention would have no obligations to implement. Those workers who were not covered by collective bargaining would not be protected by the Convention, yet they were often the most vulnerable categories of workers. The Government member of the United Kingdom agreed that if the amendment were adopted, workers who were not covered by collective agreements would not benefit from the Convention.

82. The Government members of Denmark and Germany withdrew the amendment and Point 5 was adopted without change.

C. PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS WITH A VIEW TO A CONVENTION

Point 6

83. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the text of Point 6 (1) by the following: "The Convention should apply to all part-time workers, irrespective of hours worked." The Workers' Vice-Chairperson said that the definition of part-time work adopted in the new text of Point 3 had clarified the approach of the Convention, under which part-time workers would be compared with full-time workers covered by the same type of employment relationship. It was thus no longer necessary for there to be exclusions from its scope. The Workers' members had therefore proposed a simpler text which aimed to include all part-time workers within the scope of the proposed Convention.

84. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson expressed strong opposition to the amendment. The Government members of Canada, Cyprus, the United States and Denmark, speaking on behalf of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and the United Kingdom, also opposed the amendment.

85. In view of the above opposition, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment.

86. The Government member of Japan, seconded by the Government member of Germany, submitted an amendment to add the words "except public servants" after the words "part-time workers". She explained that there were cases in which part-time workers in the public sector in Japan enjoyed the status of public servants and were therefore subject to specific laws and regulations. It was necessary to give special consideration to workers in the public sector, who had to serve the common interests of the country. The proposed Convention and Recommendation should not therefore apply to them. The Government member of Germany added that in Germany many public servants enjoyed favourable conditions of employment, including guaranteed lifetime employment. The application of the Convention to this particular category of public servants would therefore raise special problems in the context of point 12.

87. The Government member of Austria supported the amendment and noted that if the provisions of the Convention as set out in the Proposed Conclusions were applied to some part-time workers in the public sector, because of the salary structure in the public service in his country, they would receive preferential treatment in respect of full-time workers. The Government member of Malaysia emphasized that in his country the labour provisions governing workers in the public and private sectors were quite different. If the amendment was not adopted it would be difficult for his Government to ratify the Convention.

88. The Employers' members, the Workers' members and the Government members of Cyprus, the United States, Canada, the Republic of Korea and the Netherlands opposed the amendment on the grounds that public servants constituted too broad an exclusion from the provisions of the Convention. The Government member of Antigua and Barbuda warned that the proposed amendment could have the effect of introducing discrimination between employees in the public and private sectors.

89. In view of this opposition, the Government member of Japan withdrew the amendment stating that it would be possible for Japan to exclude part-time workers in the public sector by using the general procedure mentioned in Point 6 (2) at the time of ratification.

90. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words "representative organizations of employers and workers concerned" by the words "most representative organizations of employers and workers". They believed that it would be more appropriate for consultation to take place with the central organizations of employers and workers, since the exclusion of a limited category of workers or establishments from the provisions of the Convention could have a very important impact at the national level.

91. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson considered that the most representative organizations of employers and workers at the national level might not be particularly representative of workers in the category concerned by any proposed exclusion. He noted that the text of Point 5 included the need for consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers before the adoption of laws or regulations. It was therefore logical that paragraph 6 (1) should refer to more local organizations representing the specific workers concerned.

92. The Government member of Cyprus also opposed the amendment and noted that the most important consideration was the consultation of the organizations most directly concerned by any proposed exclusion. The Government member of Canada pointed out that consultations with the organizations representing the employers and workers concerned did not prevent the central representative organizations being consulted on the same issues. The Government member of Turkey and the Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the member States of the European Communities, also opposed the amendment.

93. In view of the lack of support, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment.

94. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add, after the word "may" in the second line, the words ", for a limited period of time". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson explained that the objective of the amendment was to ensure that the exclusions which were made for certain categories of workers or of establishments did not become permanent and that they were limited in time.

95. The Employers' members opposed the amendment in the belief that the possibilities for exclusions contained in the proposed text were already too limited and that they should therefore be widened rather than restricted. The scope of the Convention should be formulated in a sufficiently flexible way as to facilitate its ratification.

96. The Government members of Canada, Cyprus, Austria and Denmark, speaking on behalf of all the member States of the European Communities, opposed the amendment and emphasized that the Convention needed to allow for a certain measure of flexibility in order to ensure that it could be both ratified and implemented.

97. In view of this opposition, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment.

98. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete the words "or of establishments" in the fourth line of Point 6 (1). The Workers' members believed that the possibility of excluding categories of establishments could be used to give rise to too many exceptions to the provisions of the Convention, and that such exclusions could affect the competitiveness of other enterprises. They believed that exclusions should be confined to limited categories of workers.

99. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment because it reduced the flexibility of the Convention. The possibility of excluding certain categories of establishments could be very important in the context of small businesses. The amendment was also opposed by the Government member of Canada and Cyprus.

100. In view of this opposition, the Workers' members withdrew their amendment, although they expressed the hope that the exclusions provided for in Point 6 (1) would not be used too often.

101. The Government members of Australia, Canada and the United States submitted an amendment to delete the word "limited" in the third line of Point 6 (1). The Government member of Canada explained that the adjective "limited" was an ambiguous term which was difficult to quantify. However, the authors of the amendment withdrew it in favour of an amendment proposed by the Employers' members which sought to replace the word "limited" by the word "specific". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson agreed with the previous speaker that the word "limited" was vague and difficult to interpret. The Employers' members were concerned that the instrument should be sufficiently flexible to be widely ratified by member States. The use of the term "specific" merely meant that Governments were bound to specify the categories of workers or of establishments which they decided to exclude. He also pointed out that the use of the term "limited categories" did not necessarily guarantee that these categories would cover only a small number of workers.

102. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized the importance of retaining the term "limited". The wording in question had already been used in various recent Conventions, including the Night Work Convention, 1990 (No. 171).

103. In reply to a question concerning the meaning of the word "limited" which had been used in the Office's text to qualify the categories of workers or of establishments which it was possible to exclude from the scope of the proposed Convention, the representative of the Secretary-General indicated that the word meant that the number of workers or establishments excluded should not be high. The objective of provisions of this type was to eliminate obstacles which the competent national authorities might encounter when they were examining the possibility of ratifying a new ILO Convention. Indeed, it might happen that the provisions of a Convention could be easily applied to the great majority of workers, with the exception of certain limited categories, but that the Convention was not ratified due to these problems of application. It was to prevent this contingency that the possibility of excluding these limited categories had been included in Point 6 (1). The possibility of excluding limited categories of workers or establishments gave flexibility to the proposed Convention. It was foreseen in other ILO Conventions, including the Holidays with Pay Convention (Revised), 1970 (No. 132), the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), and the Night Work Convention, 1990 (No. 171), which also provided that limited categories of workers could be excluded from their provisions. Clearly, the types of workers or establishments which could be excluded could vary in accordance with the subject covered by the Convention and the conditions which prevailed in each country. Nevertheless, limits had been placed on the possible exclusions. The competent authority would have to consult the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned. It would also have to inform the ILO of the categories excluded and the reasons for their exclusion, which would give the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations the possibility of assessing the appropriateness of the exclusion and, in case of doubt, to intervene with the government concerned.

104. The Government member of Cyprus subamended the proposed text to replace the word "specific" by the word "particular", in order to place emphasis on the particularity of any categories of workers or establishments which were excluded. The amendment, as subamended, was supported by the Government members of Canada, Germany and the Netherlands.

105. Put to the vote, the amendment was adopted by 2,450 votes in favour and 1,789 against, with 486 abstentions.

106. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the word "special" by the word "particular" and to delete the words "of a substantial nature". The objective of the amendment was to give the text of the proposed Convention greater flexibility in order to encourage its ratification and subsequent implementation. The word "special" when used to qualify problems relating to the implementation of the Convention was restrictive and difficult to interpret. The term "particular" would be more precise and would mean that Governments had to be specific about the exclusions which they had made. Moreover, the words of "a substantial nature" were also restrictive: the proposal to delete them was motivated by the belief that it should be sufficient for Governments to explain that they had encountered particular problems.

107. In reply to a question concerning the meaning of the words "special" and "of a substantial nature" in Point 6 (1) to qualify problems relating to the application of the proposed Convention which could justify the exclusion of limited categories of workers or establishments, the representative of the Secretary-General replied that the word "special" implied that the problems should be characteristic of the category which it was intended to exclude, while the words "of a substantial nature" reflected the idea that they should be problems which were serious in practice, and not of minimal importance. It of course would be for the supervisory machinery for the application of Conventions to assess, on the basis of the explanations provided by governments, the seriousness of the problems which justified the exclusions and, in case of doubt, to request further explanations.

108. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment. The Government members of Canada, Cyprus, the United States and Denmark, speaking on behalf of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, accepted the proposal to replace the word "special" by the word "particular", but rejected the deletion of the words "of a substantial nature". The Government member of the United States added that the necessary flexibility was already contained in Point 6 (1). Governments should specify the problems which led them to decide to avail themselves of the possibility of exclusions. The Committee adopted the replacement of the word "special" by the word "particular". The Employers' members withdrew their proposal to delete the words "of a substantial nature".

109. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add at the end of paragraph 6 (1) the words ", other than those arising from the workers' part-time status." The Workers' Vice-Chairperson said that since the present provisions of Point 6 (1) allowed Governments to exclude large categories of part-time workers from the provisions of the proposed Convention, the Workers' members wished to ensure that such exclusions were not based solely on the part-time status of the workers concerned.

110. While understanding the concern of the Workers' members, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson considered that the wording contained in the proposed amendment was in contradiction with the rest of the Point. The particular problems arising under the terms of the Convention could by definition only result from the part-time status of the workers concerned. The Government member of Canada also considered that the amendment reduced the flexibility of Point 6 (1). The Government member of Cyprus, as well as the Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Governments of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, the Netherlands, Spain and the United Kingdom, opposed the amendment.

111. In view of the above opposition, the Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

112. The Government members of Canada, Japan, New Zealand and the United States submitted an amendment to Point 6 (2) to replace the words "why this exclusion was and is still judged necessary" with the words "for this exclusion". The Government member of Canada feared that the present wording contained an implicit obligation for member States to reconsider any exclusions which they made to the provisions of the Convention. The objective of the amendment was therefore to ensure that the purpose of the provision was merely to provide the International Labour Office with information so that it could keep up-to-date with the situation in member States.

113. The representative of the Secretary-General stated that the information required concerning the reasons for which exclusions had been made or were still considered necessary was intended for the ILO bodies responsible for supervising the application of ratified Conventions, in order to enable them to assess whether the reasons given by the member States really justified the exclusions which had been decided upon.

114. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment, which was also favoured by the Government members of Antigua and Barbuda, Turkey and the United Kingdom.

115. However, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson believed that Point 6 (1) already permitted sufficient flexibility. Governments should have to justify the reasons for any exclusions which they made to the provisions of the Convention. The Government members of Cyprus, Germany and the Netherlands also opposed the amendment and expressed their preference for the Office text, which did not imply a commitment to reconsider the exclusions but instead to show that they continued to be justified. The Government member of Canada withdrew the amendment.

116. Point 6 was adopted as amended.

New Point after Point 6

117. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add after Point 6 the following new Point: "Measures should be taken to identify and eliminate the direct and indirect obstacles which may prevent part-time workers from enjoying in practice the protection accorded to all workers." They emphasized that many obstacles, some of which were easy to identify, and others which were less visible or more indirect, prevented part-time workers from enjoying in practice the full protection afforded to full-time workers. It was necessary for Governments to take measures with a view to identifying and eliminating these obstacles.

118. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson strongly opposed the amendment on the grounds that it would be both undesirable and unenforceable. He noted that the terms "direct and indirect obstacles" would be difficult to interpret. The purpose behind the amendment was to give part-time workers much broader protection than that set out in Points 7, 8, 9 and 10 of the Proposed Conclusions. This would constitute a massive extension of the text and would give a completely new direction to the Proposed Conclusions. The Government members of Canada, Cyprus and Denmark, speaking on behalf of all the member States of the European Communities, also opposed the amendment. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

119. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the Point. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that, although the Employers' members were not opposed to the intention of the Office's text, it would not be enforceable in its present form. He pointed to the term "all workers", which provided only a very vague point of reference for the protection in question. It would be preferable once again to adopt the terminology "comparable full-time workers". Another problem in the original text lay in the fact that some limited aspects of the protection covered by Point 7 (a) could require proportional application to part-time workers, which was not possible under the Office's text. This provision would be more suited to a Recommendation. The amendment was supported by the Government member of Antigua and Barbuda.

120. The spokesperson for the Workers' members (the Workers' member of France) expressed absolute opposition to the amendment. The deletion of Point 7 would deny part-time workers certain fundamental rights which were recognized by other Conventions. It was inconceivable that part-time workers should not benefit from protection in areas such as freedom of association and the right to organize, occupational safety and health and the prohibition of discrimination in employment and occupation.

121. The Government members of Canada, Cyprus, Nigeria and of Denmark, speaking on behalf of all the member States of the European Communities, opposed the amendment. The Government member of the United Kingdom raised the question in relation to Point 7 (c) as to whether the present wording of the text would permit the adoption of "fair discrimination", that is positive measures to improve the conditions of the workers concerned and discrimination in circumstances where, for example, race or sex represents a genuine occupational qualification for the job. In reply, the deputy representative of the Secretary-General indicated that there were a number of reasons why so-called "fair" discrimination would be possible. Positive measures that gave more than proportional advantages to part-time workers were common, such as minimum social security benefits of various types. Where such measures already existed, the ILO Constitution specified that the adoption or ratification of a Convention should in no case affect more favourable conditions for the workers concerned.

122. The Employers' members withdrew their amendment.

123. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the introductory part of Point 7 by the following text: "Measures should be taken to ensure that part-time workers receive the same protection accorded to all workers, in particular in respect of:". They explained that the intention of the amendment was to reinforce the idea contained in the original text that measures needed to be taken to ensure that part-time workers received the same protection as full-time workers. Although many obstacles prevented part-time workers in practice from benefitting from this protection, the text left some doubt as to whether these obstacles existed. The Workers' members knew that they existed and that action needed to be taken to remove them.

124. The Employers' members opposed the amendment on the grounds that it sought to secure a massive extension of the protection laid down in Proposed Conclusions Nos. 7, 8, 9 and 10. The Government member of Canada was concerned that the use of the term "in particular" created an open-ended obligation which would encompass a series of undefined protections.

125. In response to a suggestion by the Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of all the member States of the European Communities, that the words "in particular" could be deleted from the proposed amendment, the Workers' members agreed to subamend the proposed text accordingly.

126. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson put forward a further subamendment to the proposed text to delete the word "same" and to replace the words "all workers" by the words "comparable full-time workers". He noted that the reference to all workers could limit the protection available to part-time workers since, if even small categories of workers did not enjoy a particular type of a protection, part-time workers would not be entitled to it. The wording "comparable full-time workers" made the text of more general applicability.

127. The Government members of Austria, Canada, Germany and Japan supported the inclusion of the concept of comparable full-time workers, but rejected the deletion of the word "same". The Government member of Canada shared the view that the rights enumerated in Point 7 should apply to all part-time workers. The main purpose of the text was not to establish the rights in question in absolute terms, but to ensure that the protection accorded to part- and full-time workers was comparable. The Government member of Antigua and Barbuda suggested that the word "other" should be inserted before the word "workers".

128. In response to a request for clarification from the Workers' members, the Deputy Representative of the Secretary-General pointed out that the new formulation of Point 3, which now referred to "comparable full-time workers", had a number of consequences for the rest of the text. As stated by several members, the use of the term "all workers" could have the effect of restricting the extent of the protection applicable to part-time workers, since such protection would have to be available to all other workers without exception in order to apply to part-time workers. A reference to "comparable full-time workers" would eliminate this problem and would therefore be more favourable to part-time workers. Following this clarification, the Workers' members accepted the replacement of the words "all workers" by the words "comparable full-time workers".

129. The Committee adopted the introductory part of Point 7, amended to read as follows: "Measures should be taken to ensure that part-time workers receive the same protection accorded to comparable full-time workers in respect of:".

130. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson confirmed that the Employers' members had no objection in principle to the application of fundamental rights to part-time workers. However, Point 7 (a) raised the question of the proportional application of some rights in the case of part-time work. This could be illustrated by the issue of works councils. In cases where their establishment depended on the total number of employees in an enterprise, part-time workers often counted towards the total on a pro rata basis. Countries in which this system was in force would find it very difficult to ratify a Convention which contained the present wording. The representative of the Secretary-General noted that, in the case of part-time workers, calculation of entitlements or benefits in proportion to their hours of work or earnings was not contrary to the principle of equality in certain cases. Indeed, it could be one of the means of achieving equal treatment between part– and full-time workers.

131. Point 7 was adopted as amended.

132. Considering that it was difficult to determine which of the amendments submitted on point 8 should be examined first, the Chairperson proposed that the Committee should commence with a general discussion of the amendments. He also noted that members of the Committee encountered some difficulty in respect of the meaning of the term "unit wage rates" used in the Office's text. In reply, the representative of the Secretary-General explained that the term "unit wage rates" referred to the basic wage, but did not include the various financial emoluments and bonuses which would be paid in addition to the basic wage. The basic wage could be determined in respect of units of time (the hour, the day, the week, the month), and in the case of workers who were paid by output, by unit of production. In relation to the terminology used in the amendments to compare the work performed by part-time workers with that done by full-time workers, he noted that in the context of equal pay, the term "the same work" required the work performed be strictly identical. The reference to work which was substantially the same allowed some differences between the work performed. The concept of "work of equal value", which was set out in the Equal Remuneration Convention, (No. 100) 1951, placed the emphasis on the value of the work, which could therefore have a different content while being of equal value.

133. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the Point. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson explained that the text contained in the Proposed Conclusions went much too far and, if retained, would have a serious effect on the cost of part-time work and the availability of part-time job opportunities. There were often valid reasons for differentials between the wage rates which applied to part- and full-time workers. These were related to the higher costs in relation to part-time work in respect of training and the provision of amenities, clothing and safety equipment. Moreover, the output of part-time workers and their skill levels were often lower than those of full-time workers. Full-time workers were more likely to be multi-skilled, largely as a result of the greater opportunities available to them to acquire additional qualifications, which were in their turn recompensed by higher basic wage rates.

134. The spokesperson for the Workers' members expressed the firm opposition of his group to the amendment. Although the Workers' members understood that certain components of remuneration could take account of working hours, they did not accept that basic wage rates could be other than identical. In reply to the Employers' members, the spokesperson noted that it was not necessarily true that part-time workers were less qualified than their full-time colleagues. Indeed, in many cases the opposite was the case. The Government member of Canada considered that the amendment went much too far and therefore joined with the Government member of Cyprus, and the Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Governments of Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, in opposing it. The Government member of the Netherlands considered that the Employers' members were attempting through their amendment to undermine the principle of equal pay. If this principle were removed from the proposed Convention, very little would be left. In some cases, part-time workers could be more productive than their full-time colleagues and it was for the employer to decide whether the balance of costs and benefits favoured the employment of part- or full-time workers. The Government member of the Republic of Korea, although understanding some of the concerns of the Employers' members, called upon them to retain some aspects of Point 8 rather than attempting to delete it in full. In view of this opposition, the Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

135. The Government members of Australia, Canada and the United States submitted an amendment to replace the text of Point 8 by the following:

The unit wage rates of part-time workers should be the same as those of full-time workers who are performing the same or substantially the same work in the same establishment.

Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Canada noted that, in contrast with the general requirement to prohibit discrimination in this context which had been put forward in the questionnaire in Report V (1), Point 8 of the Proposed Conclusions called for the adoption of measures by governments to identify and eliminate differences in unit wage rates between part- and full-time workers. This implied the mobilization of resources to carry out studies or to undertake the comprehensive inspection of all establishments in order to identify problems. This requirement would create difficulties for countries in which the inspection system was based on the random inspection of enterprises combined with inspection triggered by complaints. The purpose of the amendment was therefore to return to the general principle without imposing this additional burden on ratifying States. The amendment also removed the reference to "work of equal value". She explained that although her country was very active in its support for the principle of equal opportunities and treatment for men and women workers, including equal remuneration, the expression "work of equal value" was not appropriate in the context of a Convention on part-time work, which aimed at the elimination of unjustifiable discrimination based solely on the number of hours worked. Once again, it was necessary to compare what was comparable and the basis for comparison therefore had to be between part- and full-time workers who performed the same work in the same establishment. The amendment used the term "the same or substantially the same work" to avoid situations in which minor variations in a job description could be invoked to justify a lower unit wage rate for workers employed in that job on a part-time basis. However, after these explanations, the authors withdrew their proposed wording in favour of an amendment submitted by the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain.

136. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace Point 8 by the following text:

Measures should be taken to ensure that part-time workers receive remuneration at least equivalent to that of full-time workers performing the same work or work of equal value, in particular with regard to unit wage rates.

The spokesperson for the Workers' members emphasized that the great majority of part-time workers were women, who did not always choose to work on a part-time basis, but who were obliged for direct or indirect reasons to accept this form of employment. The issue of equivalence therefore took on great importance as part of the effort to reduce the gap between men and women workers in practice. He also noted that in some countries legislation had been adopted to ensure that some categories of part-time workers were paid higher basic wage rates than their full-time colleagues. In his view, such provisions were equitable on the grounds that part-time workers had frequently not chosen that form of employment out of their own personal preference.

137. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain submitted an amendment to replace Point 8 by the following text:

Measures appropriate to national custom and practice should be taken to ensure that part-time workers do not receive lower pay than comparable full-time workers performing the same work or substantially the same work, solely because they work part time.

The Government member of the Netherlands indicated that the expression "unit wage rates" was unclear, particularly in the German translation. The amendment sought to replace it by the more easily comprehensible term "pay". The proposed new wording would also encompass the possibility of part-time workers being paid higher than pro rata wage rates, which would have been prohibited under the text of Point 8 as proposed by the Office. There could be valid economic reasons for the payment of higher rates to part-time workers. The amendment also proposed to add the expression "solely because they work part time" to cover situations, such as the recognition of seniority rights, in which there were good grounds for wage differentials, while at the same time eliminating differentials which were based solely on the hours worked. Finally, the addition of the words "appropriate to national custom and practice" to qualify the measures to be taken should permit more countries to ratify the proposed instrument. The Government member of Japan supported the amendment.

138. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that Point 8 was probably the most important provision in the proposed Convention. It was important for the Committee to give the question of equal treatment all due consideration, since it could have an important effect on the employment opportunities of part-time workers. He reaffirmed that the Employers' members were not opposed to the fair treatment of part-time workers. However, the amendment proposed by the Workers' members caused serious problems by seeking to extend the concept of equal treatment to all the components of remuneration. Moreover, the term "unit wage rates" was difficult to understand, not only in its German translation. He agreed with previous speakers that the concept of work of equal value was totally inappropriate in this context. Although the amendment proposed by the Government members of a number of the Member States of the European Communities had some advantages, such as the use of the term "comparable full-time workers", the expression "pay" raised a number of problems. This could also be interpreted to include fringe benefits. Moreover, the whole amendment could even be interpreted as meaning that part-time workers should receive the same pay as comparable full-time workers irrespective of the hours worked. It was therefore important to include the concept of pro rata pay. He proposed to subamend the text by replacing the word "pay" by the term "pro rata basic wage rates", which would guarantee fair treatment to part-time workers. The Government member of Canada supported this subamendment.

139. In reply, the spokesperson for the Workers' members called for the inclusion in the above amendment of a reference to work of equal value in view of the importance of the principle to women, who made up such a large proportion of part-time workers. He also requested a clarification concerning the use of the phrase "appropriate to national custom and practice" in ILO instruments. In response, the representative of the Secretary-General agreed that the term was not common in ILO instruments. A more frequently used term was "national law and practice", which also included such processes as collective bargaining and arbitration. The representative of the Secretary-General added that references to national conditions or law and practice had been inserted into a number of ILO instruments, usually with the intention of rendering them more flexible or easy to ratify. However, such phrases did not have this effect in practice. The provisions of a Convention, once ratified, had to be applied. A ratifying State could not therefore refer to such a phrase in order to escape the obligations which had been accepted. The phrase was therefore superfluous and perhaps misleading. Turning to the question of the inclusion of the term "pro rata" in the Employers' members subamendment to qualify basic wage rates, he considered that it was inappropriate since wage rates should be identical for comparable part- and full-time workers. However, the total wage of part-time workers over a particular period received as the basic wage would necessarily be lower than that received by full-time workers for the same period, since it would be obtained by multiplying the basic wage rate by the number of hours of work, which would be fewer than those worked by the full time worker.

140. A revised amendment was submitted by the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain to replace Point 8 by the following text:

Measures appropriate to national law and practice should be taken to ensure that part-time workers do not receive a lower basic wage calculated proportionately in relation to that of comparable full time workers performing the same work or substantially the same work, solely because they work part time.

The Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Communities mentioned above, agreed that the term "pro rata" should not be applied to wage rates based on units of time or units of production, which should be the same for the two categories of workers. However, it applied to the amount earned by part-time workers in respect of their basic wage over a determined period since the amount was a function of the number of hours of work performed or the number of production units completed over that period.

141. The spokesperson for the Workers' members still considered that the reference to national law and practice was superfluous. In explanation of the term "basic wages", he said that in cases in which part-time work was paid by the hour, the value of an hour of work had to be the same for comparable part- and full-time workers. Clearly, the wage would be calculated pro rata to the hours worked. He re-emphasized the importance of the concept of work of equal value in view of the fact that the majority of part-time workers were women. He also once again called for clarifications concerning concept of the basic wage and on what would happen, in terms of the comparability of part- and full-time workers, in enterprises in which the whole workforce was composed of part-time workers.

142. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that "basic wage" was the expression in financial terms of the value of a specific unit of work, and that the value was the same for all those who performed such work. In addition to the amounts which resulted from the application of the basic wage rate, workers were entitled to emoluments and bonuses, most of which were provided in cash, although some were furnished in kind, as a function of their individual characteristics, such as seniority in the establishment, the conditions under which they worked, including bonuses for night work or weekend work, and other factors. The total amount resulting from the basic wage and additional emoluments constituted remuneration. With regard to the concept of comparable full-time workers, he recalled that it had been defined in Point 3 to include not only workers in the same establishment, but also workers in the same branch of activity. If there were no comparable full-time workers in a specific establishment, they would be sought in other establishments in the same branch. He also wondered whether it was necessary to qualify the type of work performed by the two categories of workers since the text of the amendment referred to comparable full-time workers and in view of the fact that the text of the definition adopted in Point 3 of the Proposed Conclusions already contained a reference to the same or a similar type of work as that of the part-time worker concerned.

143. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson agreed that the reference to national law and practice was unnecessary, particularly since Point 5 already made such a reference. He approved of the use of the term "basic wage", which was more consistent with the terminology used in the proposed Recommendation, and welcomed the move away from the words "unit wage". Although he agreed with the definition given by the representative of the Secretary-General of the concept of "basic wage", he pointed out that the time basis for the wages of most full-time workers was in practice the week or the month, rather than the hour. It was therefore even more important to refer to the pro rata calculation of the basic wage of part-time workers. Finally, he noted that since the Committee had agreed upon a definition of part-time workers in relation to comparable full-time workers, the phrase "comparable full-time workers" made the words "performing the same work or substantially the same work" redundant.

144. In reply, the spokesperson for the Workers' group pointed out that many full-time workers were paid by the hour, or even on a piecework basis.

145. In response to a number of comments by the Government member of Switzerland concerning the drafting of the proposed amended text, the Government member of Canada put forward a subamendment to replace the Point by the following text:

Measures appropriate to national law and practice should be taken to ensure that part time workers do not, solely because they work part time, receive a lower basic wage as calculated proportionately in relation to that of comparable full-time workers.

Since the phrase "appropriate to national law and practice" did not change the meaning of the text significantly, she was not opposed to its deletion. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Communities mentioned in paragraph 140, supported the above subamendment, although the Employers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the proposed wording of the Point would require some further attention from the Committee's Drafting Committee. The spokesperson for the Workers' members also accepted the proposed wording as the solution which caused the fewest problems.

146. Point 8 was adopted as amended.

147. The Government members of France and the United Kingdom submitted an amendment to replace, in the first sentence of Point 9, the words after "enjoy" by the words "appropriate social protection", and to replace, in the second sentence, the words "these conditions" by the words "such protection". The Government member of France explained that the concept of equivalent conditions in relation to statutory social security schemes would give rise to problems in a number of countries, including his own, which would encounter difficulties in fully aligning the social security coverage of part- and full-time workers. Some workers who were employed for very short hours were excluded from the protection provided by certain statutory social security schemes. Therefore, although the authors of the amendment did not question the proportionality of entitlements, the main problems arose with regard to the access of those workers with very low earnings. The concept of appropriate social protection contained in the amendment meant that part-time workers needed to be covered by social protection, which should be of an appropriate form to take into account their specific situation.

148. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson also supported the amendment. He emphasized that there was a need to examine closely the treatment of part-time workers by social security schemes and that "appropriate", as opposed to "equivalent" protection could in fact be more favourable to them than to comparable full-time workers. This could be the case, for example, of unemployment benefits for which a minimum level of benefit had been established. The Government members of Antigua and Barbuda, Germany and Japan also supported the amendment. The Government member of Japan noted that in her country part-time workers were entitled to pensions, social security and unemployment benefits, although some of the part-time workers were covered by different social security schemes than those of full-time workers. The Government member of the United Kingdom, referring to the original text of the Point, noted that equivalent conditions were not achievable in practice in the context of social security. To her, "equivalent" meant "exactly the same" or "identical". There needed to be some flexibility. Part-time workers should be provided with reasonable protection in relation to full-time workers, but not identical protection.

149. The Government member of Canada indicated that in her view the term "equivalent" did not mean "identical". The protection provided to part-time workers should be comparable to that of their full-time colleagues. The social security protection of part-time workers raised questions in relation to both access to protection and the level of benefits. The concept of equivalent conditions meant, for example, as was the case in her own country, that the conditions of access to maternity benefit were the same for part- and full-time workers, although the level of financial benefits varied according to their earnings. Her delegation therefore had no problems accepting the term "equivalent conditions" in the Office's text. She also noted that the proposed wording of Points 10 and 11 left room for exclusions, which should be sufficient to cover the concerns of the authors of the amendment. The spokesperson for the Workers' members agreed that the term "equivalent" did not signify "identical". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that the word "equivalent" meant "of equal value". The Government members of Chile, Cyprus and Senegal also opposed the amendment. The Government member of Cyprus explained that the aim of the Point was for countries to ensure that social security qualifying conditions did not leave out part-time workers. The Government member of the United States noted that the concept of equivalence was vital to the protection of part-time workers in respect of both their access to protection and the level of benefits.

150. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that the overall aim of the proposed Convention was to bring the conditions of part-time workers closer to those of comparable full-time workers. The use of the word "equivalent" in Point 9 meant that, in certain cases the two categories of workers would enjoy exactly the same protection and that in other cases the protection of part-time workers could be determined in proportion to their working hours or contributions. Taking the example of the two temporary workers, one part-time and the other full- time, who fell ill, he said that, the part-time worker would be entitled to receive exactly the same care as the full-time colleague. However, the benefits paid during sick leave would be calculated as a fraction of earnings, and the earnings of the part-time workers would necessarily be lower than those of a comparable full-time colleague. In other words, the calculation of entitlements or benefits on the basis of working hours, earnings or contributions of part-time workers was, in appropriate cases, a means of achieving equality of treatment between part-time workers and comparable full-time workers.

151. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by 8,526 votes in favour and 9,310 against, with 1,274 abstentions.

152. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words "enjoy equivalent conditions to those of other workers. Where appropriate, these conditions" by the words "may participate in such schemes in an appropriate manner. Where appropriate, thresholds may be established for participation and benefits". In view of the Committee's decision on the last amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson subamended the above text to replace the word "appropriate" in the first sentence by the word "equitable". He explained that the use of the word "equitable" meant that the workers concerned should be treated in a fair manner.

153. The Government member of Canada explained that the original text of the Proposed Conclusions had left open the possibility that the conditions enjoyed by part-time workers could be adapted to their hours of work. These conditions included both access to coverage and the benefits to which they were entitled. She noted that under the national pension plan in her country all workers were covered, with the exception of those who worked less than a minimum number of hours or did not attain a minimum earnings threshold. She warned that these exclusions and adaptations might not be possible under the text proposed by the Employers' members. The Government member of Germany also opposed the amendment.

154. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson specified that the first sentence of Point 9 as subamended would read "statutory social security schemes which are based on occupational activity should be adapted to the occupational circumstances of part-time workers so that these workers enjoy equitable conditions in comparison with those of comparable full-time workers." He noted that the word "equitable" had been used in Points 20 and 21 of the Proposed Conclusions.

155. The spokesperson for the Workers' members believed that the word "equitable" was too vague to lend itself to clear interpretation. She also indicated that the amendment was a way of reproposing what had already been decided in the previous vote and that this was not acceptable. In reply to a request concerning the word "equitable", the Representative of the Secretary-General considered that it would be for the supervisory machinery for the application of Conventions to assess whether the treatment of part-time workers was equitable.

156. Put to the vote, the subamendment was rejected by 8,330 votes in favour and 9,702 against, with 882 abstentions.

157. The Government members of the Member States of the European Communities submitted an amendment to replace, in the fourth and fifth lines, the words "in proportion to hours of work or contributions" by the words "with reference to hours of work, contributions or earnings". The amendment was adopted without discussion.

158. Point 9 was adopted as amended. As a consequence of the adoption of the definition contained in Point 3, the Committee decided to replace the words "other workers" by the words "comparable full-time workers".

159. The Government members of the Member States of the European Communities submitted an amendment to replace the words "other workers in the establishment or branch of activity concerned" by the words "comparable full-time workers". The amendment was adopted.

160. The Government member of Japan withdrew a number of proposed amendments on the understanding that the term "equivalent conditions" could be understood in some cases as permitting the calculation of the conditions due to part-time workers in proportion to their days of work, hours of work or earnings.

161. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add, after the word "concerned", the words "for all working conditions and, in particular". The spokesperson for the Workers' members called upon the Committee to support this important amendment which sought to establish the right of part-time workers to enjoy equivalent conditions to comparable full-time workers in respect of all working conditions, and not just those enumerated in Point 10.

162. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson, referring to the earlier discussions of the Committee on similar issues, noted that this amendment constituted an attempt to incorporate a massive extension of the areas of protection covered by the Convention. In Proposed Conclusions Nos. 7, 8, 9 and 10, the protection of part-time workers was dealt with in a very specific manner by identifying the exact areas of protection covered. The approach adopted by the proposed amendment was erroneous and vague and the resulting provision would be virtually unenforceable. The amendment was also opposed by the Government members of Canada, Cyprus and United States. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

163. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to Point 10 (a) to add at the end of the clause the words ", parental leave and leave for family reasons". The spokesman for the Workers' group noted that these issues were already covered by the proposed Recommendation. The concept of parental leave had taken on great importance and, particularly in view of the fact that the ILO instruments on maternity protection had been adopted too long ago to incorporate it, the Workers' members believed that it would now be an appropriate time to introduce it into a Convention. Parental leave and leave for family reasons were complementary to maternity protection.

164. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the amendment constituted an extension of the text proposed by the Office and went beyond the matters raised in the questionnaire. The rights established in Point 10 had a universal character, which was not the case of parental leave and leave for family reasons. Although it was generally accepted that the rights covered in Point 10 (a), (b) and (c) applied to comparable full-time workers, parental leave was not universally established for them. Moreover, the question of leave for family reasons was somewhat vague and would be difficult to cover through legislative provisions.

165. The Government members of Denmark and Norway, although agreeing with the principle of parental leave and leave for family reasons, felt that the proposed wording was better suited to a Recommendation. The Government member of Antigua and Barbuda noted that parental leave and leave for family reasons were not yet established in his country and opposed the amendment. The Government member of Cyprus added that such leave was not guaranteed by law or collective agreements in her country and that the inclusion of the proposed words would prevent her Government from ratifying the Convention. The Government member of Austria raised the question as to the exact definition of maternity protection. In his country, it included the protection of pregnant women employed in jobs that could be harmful, nursing breaks, maternity leave, as well as the protection of their jobs. Following a request for clarification from the Government member of the United Kingdom, the representative of the Secretary-General said that the maternity protection referred to in Point 10 (a) was that which existed in each country and not that provided for in the relevant ILO standards, the objective of the new standards being to provide the same protection to part-time workers as that available to comparable full time workers.

166. The spokesperson for the Workers' group emphasized that the Workers' members placed great emphasis on the concepts of parental leave and leave for family reasons and hoped that they would be retained in the Recommendation. He also noted that they were not attempting to establish rights for part-time workers which were not enjoyed by comparable full-time workers in the same country. He withdrew the amendment.

167. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add, after clause (c), the following new clauses: "access to training, career opportunities and occupational mobility". The spokesman for the Workers' group recalled that many speakers from all groups had agreed that part-time work was particularly prevalent among women. It was therefore especially important that they should have the right to training and career opportunities. The fact that part-time workers enjoyed few career and training opportunities constituted another form of discrimination against women. It was therefore important for these rights to be enshrined in a Convention, rather than merely a Recommendation.

168. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that, although his group was not opposed to the principle behind the amendment, it was not appropriate to include reference to access to training, career opportunities and occupational mobility in the proposed Convention. The proposed wording would undoubtedly create substantial difficulties for developing countries. However, the principle was important and should be retained in the proposed Recommendation. The Government members of Canada, Cyprus, Denmark, Germany and the United States, although supporting the principle behind the amendment, considered it inappropriate in the proposed Convention. The Government member of Canada emphasized that the subject covered by the amendment would be difficult to cover through legislation. The Government member of Germany wondered whether the amendment would have the effect of obliging countries to establish special apprenticeship training programmes on a part-time basis, which effect could not be agreed to by Germany.

169. The Government member of France considered that the absence of discrimination in part-time work in respect of access to training and career opportunities was vital for the promotion of part-time work. It would be impossible to promote the creation of part-time job opportunities if the workers concerned were not offered the same career prospects as comparable full-time workers. He therefore supported the amendment.

170. The spokesperson for the Workers' members withdrew the amendment and specified that the Workers' members considered that the Point was very important and that they would raise it again when dealing with the Recommendation.

171. Point 10 was adopted as amended.

172. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete the Point. They believed that it meant that many part-time workers would be excluded from the protection provided in Points 9 and 10 if the thresholds envisaged under Point 11 were to be maintained. They particularly objected to the establishment of exclusions in respect of the matters covered by Point 10, namely maternity protection, termination of employment and paid annual leave and paid public holidays.

173. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson strongly opposed the amendment and explained that it was very important to be able to establish thresholds in relation to the matters covered by Points 9 and 10. Many national social security schemes had adopted thresholds for good financial and administrative reasons. He took the example of a worker who was employed for a minimal number of hours in the week, whom it should be possible to exclude from access to certain social security schemes or from the application of some aspects of the protection referred to in Point 10, by means of the application of thresholds, in order to avoid an undue administrative workload and disproportionate costs. The Government member of Canada also strongly opposed the amendment, although she understood the concerns of the Workers' members. In order to avoid undue administrative burdens, statutory social security schemes normally set thresholds, which might be very low, below which there was no access to the scheme. Moreover, there was little point in providing certain categories of part-time workers with full coverage. A good illustration was the case of students who worked very few hours in order to help finance their studies. They preferred to receive higher take-home pay rather than contribute to a social security scheme, which, in any case, might only provide them with marginal benefits. The Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of all the Member States of the European Communities, emphasized the need for flexibility in the instrument in order to permit a high number of ratifications, including on the part of developing countries. The Government member of Cyprus believed that the text proposed by the Office was well balanced.

174. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson requested a clarification from the Office as to how the thresholds relating to maternity protection, termination of employment and paid annual and paid public holidays would affect the application of the relevant ILO Conventions on these subjects. In reply, the representative of the Secretary-General said that the Office had included the concept of thresholds in the Proposed Conclusions because they were frequently used in national legislation, as well as to add to the flexibility of the Convention. He referred to Point 4, which provided that the proposed Convention on part-time work should not affect more favourable provisions applicable to part-time workers under other ILO Conventions. Moreover, he noted that the provisions of Conventions only became applicable to workers once the Convention had been ratified by a member State. Thus, countries which had not ratified the ILO Conventions covering the three matters contained in Point 10 would have every freedom to apply the thresholds set out in Point 11. On the other hand, the capacity to apply the thresholds mentioned in Point 11 would vary amongst countries which had ratified those Conventions, according to the way in which the scope of these Conventions was defined. For example, Conventions Nos. 3 and 103 on maternity protection permitted no exclusions, so a member State which was bound by the Convention on part-time work would not be able to apply the thresholds in relation to the aspects of maternity protection which were dealt with in those two Conventions. The situation was somewhat different in the case of the Holidays with Pay Convention (Revised), 1970 (No. 132), and the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158). These two Conventions permitted the competent authority in each country to exclude limited categories of workers from their scope. A member State which had ratified them could accordingly avail themselves of the thresholds referred to in Point 11, but solely in so far as the workers thus excluded constituted only a limited category of workers. In view of these explanations, and although she still considered that Point 11 weakened the Convention, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment.

175. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert the words "old age benefits and health care benefits" after the words "employment injury benefits" in Point 11 (1). The Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that old age and health care benefits should also be exempt from the application of thresholds, in the same way that the Office text already exempted employment injury benefits.

176. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson explained that the exception contained in Point 11 (1) as regards employment injury benefits had its roots in the special nature of those benefits. To extend this exception to cover old age and health care benefits would have a major financial impact on social security schemes. The Government member of Canada opposed the amendment under discussion, indicating that it would create a problem for her country since old age and health care benefits were not part of statutory social security schemes based on occupational activity, but of schemes applicable to the population as a whole. However, the linkage proposed in the amendment could impede ratification by many other member States. The Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of all the Member States of the European Communities, and the Government member of Austria, also opposed the amendment. In view of the above opposition, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment.

177. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete the words "and of any of the measures taken in the fields mentioned under Point 10". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized the importance of this Point. Part-time workers had great need of maternity protection and protection in respect of termination of employment, without exceptions, as well as paid annual leave and paid public holidays. If protection in these matters was denied to part-time workers who were below a certain threshold of hours of work or earnings, this would run against ILO Conventions which had previously been adopted on these matters.

178. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that, in accordance with the explanation provided by the representative of the Secretary-General, the provisions of the other Conventions in question would not be affected by the exclusions set out in the Point 11. It was very important to give the possibility of setting thresholds in the areas covered by Point 10. It was only reasonable to be able to establish thresholds which excluded from these forms of protection workers who were employed for a minimal number of hours a week.

179. The Government member of Canada explained that under the maternity protection system in her country no distinction was made between part-time and full-time workers who, once they had qualified, were entitled to financial benefits on a pro rata basis. However, all workers had to have completed a certain period of attachment to the workforce in order to qualify for coverage. If not, they were covered by the social welfare system. Since this period was the same for both part- and full-time workers, she wondered whether this system would be possible under the provisions of the Convention if the amendment were adopted. The representative of the Secretary-General considered that, with or without thresholds, the proposed Convention on part-time work would not prevent a member State from deciding that access to maternity protection would depend on a specified period of service. Nonetheless, that member State should have to treat part-time workers the same, in this respect, as comparable full-time workers.

180. The Government member of France stated that, even though the situation in his country would allow him to support the amendment, he believed that sufficient flexibility should be left to enable as many other countries as possible to ratify the Convention. He therefore believed it would be better not to adopt the amendment. The Government member of Belgium shared this point of view although his country had no intention of introducing such thresholds. The Government members of Cyprus and the Czech Republic explained that only very low thresholds applied in their countries. However, governments should have the freedom to adopt such thresholds. The Government members of Austria and the United Kingdom agreed with the previous speakers. The Government member of Japan added that there were no thresholds in her country as regards termination of employment. However, maternity protection was covered by the health care insurance programme, to which thresholds applied. She therefore opposed the amendment.

181. However, the Government members of Australia, Germany and Norway supported the amendment. The Government member of Germany considered that rights in the area of maternity protection, termination of employment and paid annual leave were of fundamental importance and should apply to both part- and full-time workers. There was no reason to establish exclusions in these areas.

182. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson explained that her proposal to exempt the areas of protection dealt with in Point 10 from the application of the thresholds referred to in Point 11 did not mean that the pecuniary benefits provided could not be determined proportionately to hours of work or earnings.

183. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the amendment proposed by the Workers' members could have an important negative impact on job creation for part-time workers. The result of the amendment would be a considerable increase in the cost of employing part-time workers, which would particularly affect small businesses. Although under Point 10 pecuniary entitlements could be determined in proportion to hours of work or earnings, this was not the case for non-pecuniary benefits. The possibility allowed under Point 11 (1) to establish thresholds for access to protection in the matters covered in Point 10 was therefore of great importance, particularly in view of the flexibility which should be introduced in order to permit ratification by developing countries.

184. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by 65,072 votes in favour and 83,104 votes against, with 4,704 abstentions.

185. Two amendments, one submitted by the Employers' members and another by the Government member of Japan, sought to delete the words at the end of Point 11 (1): "which should be sufficiently low not to exclude a significant percentage of part-time workers". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that the original text of Point 11 (1) raised considerable difficulties concerning the precise interpretation of the words "a significant percentage of part-time workers". Some workers might want to work less than a threshold number of hours so as, not to make social security contributions, for example. Moreover, the case of student part-time workers illustrated the need to retain the possibility of setting thresholds which did in fact include a significant number of part-time workers. There were a number of valid reasons why student part-time workers might not wish to be covered by certain protection schemes, yet they made up a significant percentage of part-time workers in many countries. Governments had to be left the possibility of adapting their systems of social protection to such categories of part-time workers. The Government member of Japan added that she was not opposed to the basic principle that thresholds should be set at a very low level. However, she noted that under Point 11 (2) (a) thresholds would have to be reviewed periodically and that under Point 11 (3) the most representative organizations of employers and workers would have to be consulted when thresholds were established or revised. These provisions would be sufficient on their own to guarantee that thresholds remained low. She considered that the term "a significant percentage" was abstract. It should therefore be left to each member State to set the relevant thresholds at levels which were appropriate to national circumstances. The Government member of Austria supported the amendment, although he believed that a wording would be acceptable which provided that the majority of part-time workers could not be excluded. The Government member of Indonesia considered that the provisions contained in Points 5 and 11 (3) were sufficient to guarantee that exclusions were not too broad. The Government member of the Republic of Korea believed that the two amendments covered the concerns of the developing countries.

186. Opposing the amendments, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson considered that where thresholds were applied, a large proportion of part-time workers were deprived of protection, to the extent that employers recruited them to work fewer hours than the thresholds, so as to make savings on labour costs. Moreover, the two proposed amendments would have the effect of permitting the establishment of thresholds at any level, even just below normal full-time hours. Although there might be administrative grounds for the establishment of thresholds, they should be set at a very low level. The Government member of Cyprus indicated that the original wording of Point 11 (1) provided an important safeguard to ensure that undue advantage was not taken of the possibility of establishing thresholds. The text proposed by the Office was a good compromise which allowed exclusions but set certain limits upon them. The Government member of Canada supported the principle of avoiding exclusions which could cover nearly all part-time workers. The Government members of Australia and the United States also opposed the amendment. The Government members of Denmark and Germany, although opposing the amendments, suggested that a compromise might be reached through an amendment they would introduce later to replace, in the Office's text, the words "a significant" by the words "an unduly large". The Government member of the United Kingdom believed that there needed to be certain limits set to the exclusions permitted. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Japan withdrew their amendments at this stage of the discussion in favour of the amendment submitted by the Government members of a number of Member States of the European Communities.

187. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words "not to exclude a significant percentage of part-time workers" by the words "so that at most a negligible number of part-time workers would be excluded". In response to a call from the Workers' members to comment on the provision under discussion, the representative of the Secretary-General explained that a Convention lost much of its purpose if broad categories of workers could be excluded from its provisions. The Committee had already changed the exclusion contained in Point 6 (1) from "limited" to "particular" categories of workers or establishments which could be excluded from the scope of the proposed Convention. Following this explanation the Workers' Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment in favour of the previously mentioned amendment submitted by the Government members of a number of Member States of the European Communities.

188. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, Spain and the United Kingdom submitted an amendment to replace the words "a significant" by the words "an unduly large". Speaking on behalf of the authors of the amendment, the Government member of Denmark explained that they were in favour of the establishment of thresholds to a certain extent. Sufficient flexibility was required to allow the governments of developing countries to ratify the Convention. Although the Workers' members opposed the text proposed by the Office for Point 11 (1), they were able to accept the amendment and it was adopted.

189. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add at the end of Point 11 (1) the following text: "it being understood that a Member may not introduce new thresholds, where these do not exist, or increase the thresholds provided for under existing legislation." The Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized the need to make it clear in the Convention that the instrument did not permit the establishment of new thresholds which did not already exist.

190. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment which, he considered, would unreasonably restrict the flexibility of the instrument. Such flexibility was particularly important in view of the fact that the incidence of part-time work was not uniform; in many countries, part-time work was not yet of great significance, but it could take on an increasing importance. In such countries, although at the present time it might not have been found necessary to establish thresholds, as part-time work increased in importance the governments might begin to realize the need for them. The Government members of Canada, Cyprus, the United States and the Member States of the European Communities opposed the amendment, which was withdrawn.

191. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete in Point 11 (2) (b) the words "the reasons therefor and the action taken to extend progressively protection to the workers excluded". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson warned that the current wording of the text had a clear implication that action would need to be taken to extend progressively protection to the workers excluded. The Employers' members believed that the commitment imposed upon governments should be limited to indicating the thresholds which had been determined.

192. The Government members of Canada, Japan, New Zealand and the United States submitted a similar amendment, which however retained the words "the reasons therefor". The amendment was also supported by the Government members of Norway and Sweden. The Government member of Canada explained that the Office text carried an implicit obligation to eliminate progressively all the exclusions permitted under Point 11 (1). This obligation might not only be unrealistic but it could also have the effect of cancelling the flexibility contained in earlier points of the proposed Convention.

193. The Government members of the Member States of the European Communities also submitted an amendment affecting the same words, which sought to replace the words "action taken to extend progressively protection" by the words "the consideration given to the progressive extension of protection". Speaking on behalf of the authors of the amendment, the Government member of Denmark said that its intention had been to weaken slightly the strictness of the Office text. She considered that the new formulation proposed could be a good compromise.

194. The Government member of Canada proposed to subamend the above amendment to read as follows: "whether consideration is being given to the progressive extension of protection". The Government member of Cyprus supported the subamendment.

195. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment proposed by the Employers' members. However, she could support the amendment proposed by the member States of the European Communities in its original form. She requested a clarification from the Office concerning the effects of this latest amendment on the supervision of the application of the Convention. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that under the amendment, member States which ratified the Convention would have to explain to the Office the type of consideration being given to the extension of protection to the workers excluded. However, as subamended by the Government member of Canada, they would only need to inform the Office whether consideration was being given to such an extension. If the answer to this was "yes", members would doubtless also describe the nature of the extension being considered; moreover, the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions could ask for explanations where these had not already been given. Following this clarification, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson accepted the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Canada. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

196. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace, in Point 11 (3), the words "establishment or revision" by the words "establishment or review". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson noted that the term "revision" implied the necessity of change, whereas the word "review" did not imply any need to modify thresholds which had been established. He pointed out that the word "review" had been used in Point 11 (2) (a). Following a suggestion from the representative of the Secretary-General, he agreed to accept the formulation "establishment, review or revision". The amendment was adopted as subamended.

197. Point 11 was adopted as amended.

198. The Government members of Canada, Norway and the United States, supported by the Government members of Austria, New Zealand and Sweden, submitted an amendment to delete the Point. The Government member of Canada considered that the adoption of national policies to promote productive and freely chosen employment was already covered by the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). Moreover, member States could of their own accord adopt the measures which they considered to be necessary to encourage the creation of employment for all categories of workers. It was therefore unnecessary to include a requirement in the proposed Convention for the adoption of measures to encourage the promotion of a single category of employment. The proposed Convention should focus on establishing for part-time workers equivalent protection to that of comparable full-time workers, rather than on the promotion of part-time work.

199. The Workers' members also submitted an amendment to delete the Point. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson noted that in some member States part-time work had existed for a long time and now accounted for a large proportion of total employment. There was little need for promotional measures in those countries where this form of employment clearly suited the needs of employers and responded to the preferences of a part of the workforce to work fewer hours, even at the price of a corresponding reduction in their wages. In developing countries the promotion of part-time work, which was often synonymous with very bad working conditions, would not be appropriate. Moreover, the Workers' members considered that the promotion of part-time work, as currently practised without the necessary protection, would have the effect of worsening the working conditions of workers in general. In their view, the protection of part-time workers should be by far the most important aspect of the proposed instruments.

200. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson expressed consternation at the proposal to delete the only Point in the Convention which dealt with the promotion of part-time work. When the item on part-time work had been included on the agenda of the Conference, the Governing Body had expressed the expectation that the instruments would cover both the promotion and the protection of part-time work. The text proposed by the Office had been prepared on that understanding. The Committee had reached an advanced stage of its work, which had been undertaken in a cooperative and constructive atmosphere, and many statements had been made concerning the importance of part-time work in relation to job creation, particularly during times of high unemployment. It was therefore inadmissible that a proposal should now be made to eliminate any reference to the promotion of this form of employment from the proposed Convention.

201. The Government members of Australia, Cyprus and Germany also opposed the deletion of the Point. The Government member of Cyprus considered that only the introductory part of Point 12 raised any problems, and that the subsequent clauses contained useful ideas. The Government member of Australia emphasized that the promotion of part-time work should not be at the expense of full-time employment opportunities. The Government member of Germany opposed the deletion of Point 12 by indicating that in his country the demand for part-time work was greater than the number of opportunities available. Access to part-time work was important mainly for women who very often have to combine their family responsibilities with the possibility of remaining in the labour market. If they left work for a number of years in order to bring up children, the resulting break in their careers and the loss of the necessary skills severely jeopardized their future employment prospects.

202. The Government member of Austria said that nothing prevented a country from taking measures to promote part-time work. Nevertheless, he objected to an obligation being placed on governments to promote a particular form of employment. He therefore supported the proposal to delete the Point.

203. The Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Communities, believed that some of the concepts contained in Point 12, and particularly clause (a), should be retained. She therefore recommended that the Committee turn its attention to an amendment submitted by the Workers' members, which sought to replace the first three lines of Point 12 by the following text:

> Measures should be taken to facilitate access to productive and freely chosen part-time jobs which meet the needs of both workers and employers through.

In response, the Government member of Canada proposed to subamend the whole of Point 12 to read as follows:

> (a) reviewing of laws or regulations that may discourage recourse to or acceptance of part-time work, in particular in the field of social security, as outlined in Points 7 to 10;
> (b) the use of employment services to identify and publicize possibilities for part-time work in their information and placement activities.

She explained that the above subamendment involved the deletion of clause (b) from the original text of the Point.

204. The Government members of the Member States of the European Communities and Nigeria supported this subamendment. The Government member of France emphasized the importance of part-time work as a means of resolving employment problems. However, measures to promote part-time work should not be imposed upon governments. He regretted that it was proposed to omit clause (b) which referred to a number of categories of workers for whom part-time work was particularly important.

205. The Committee decided to submit the wording of Point 12 to an informal tripartite working group. It also decided that the other amendments which had been proposed should be introduced in order to assist the working group in its task of preparing a text for Point 12 which would be acceptable to the Committee.

206. The Workers' members had submitted three other amendments to Point 12. One of these sought to replace Point 12 (a) by the following text: "the improvement of working conditions and social security for part-time workers as outlined in this Convention;". The Workers' members considered that there was a very close link between the promotion and protection of part-time work, and that it was therefore important for the instrument to acknowledge that the promotion of part-time work was most effective when part-time workers were fully protected in respect of their working conditions and social security. They also proposed to replace Point 12 (b) by the following text: "the implementation of programmes designed to extend the range of freely chosen part-time jobs available to all categories of workers". The Workers' members believed that it was not the correct approach to facilitate access to part-time work only for specific categories of workers. The proposed measures should apply to all categories of workers. Finally, they also proposed to add a new clause at the end of Point 12, which would be worded as follows: "research on the ability of part-time work to respond to workers' economic and social needs." The Workers' members doubted that part-time work in practice suited the economic and social needs of workers. In order to elucidate the question, it was necessary to take measures with a view obtaining information on this aspect of part-time employment.

207. The Employers' members had submitted two amendments to Point 12. The first sought to delete in Point 12 (a) the words "provided that the protection referred to in Points 7 to 10 above is ensured". The Employers' members had submitted the amendment in the belief that the words were redundant, since the countries which ratified the Convention would clearly provide the protection required under its provisions. They also proposed to add the following new clause to Point 12: "The removal of any limitations or restrictions on the number of part-time workers who may be employed in an establishment or branch of activity." The Employers' Vice-Chairperson explained that the amendment had been proposed in response to the existence in some countries or sectors of limitations on the number of part-time workers. These limitations sometimes took the form of absolute restrictions and were sometimes set at a particular percentage of the workforce. These measures were artificial and indefensible and should be removed.

208. Following the presentation of the amendments, the informal working group submitted an amendment to the Committee to replace Point 12 by the following text:

> (1) Measures should be taken to facilitate access to productive and freely chosen part-time jobs which meet the needs of both employers and workers, provided that the protection referred to in Points 7 to 10 above is ensured.
> (2) These measures should include:
> (a) review of laws or regulations that may prevent or discourage recourse to or acceptance of part-time work;
> (b) the use of employment services, where they exist, to identify and publicize possibilities for part-time work in their information and placement activities;
> (c) special attention, in employment policies, to the needs and preferences of specific groups such as the unemployed, workers with family responsibilities, older workers, disabled workers and workers undergoing education or training.
> (3) These measures may also include research and dissemination of information on the degree to which part-time work responds to the economic and social aims of employers and workers.

209. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson expressed support for the above amendment, although he believed that the expression "part-time jobs" should be replaced by the term "part-time work," which was used elsewhere in the Proposed Conclusions. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson also supported the amendment and proposed the replacement of the words "disabled workers" by the term "workers with disabilities". The other amendments submitted by the Employers' and Workers' members to Point 12 were withdrawn.

210. Point 12 was adopted as amended.

New Points to be added after Point 12

211. Four amendments were submitted for the inclusion of new Points in the proposed Convention.

212. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to transfer to the Convention a point of the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation (point 29) which read as follows:

> Where obligations on employers depend on the number of their employees, part-time workers should be given less weight than full-time workers, unless this would not be appropriate, for example for reasons of occupational safety and health.

The Employers' Vice-Chairperson explained that in some countries certain obligations which were incumbent upon employers depended on the numbers of workers in the establishment or enterprise concerned. In such cases, part-time workers should be given an appropriate but lower weighting than full-time workers. However, this should not apply to questions related to occupational safety and health.

213. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson believed that this provision should be discussed when dealing with Point 29 of the proposed Recommendation. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Japan, Norway, Sweden, Turkey and the United States, as well as the Member States of the European Communities, also opposed the amendment. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

214. The Employers' members submitted an amendment proposing to transfer to the Convention another point of the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation (Point 30) as follows:

Information should be widely disseminated on the advantages of part-time work for both employers and workers, on the protective and promotional measures that apply to such work, and on practical arrangements for various part-time work schemes.

The Employers' Vice-Chairperson explained that it was important for information to be made available both on the protective measures taken in relation to part-time work and on the promotion of part-time work.

215. The Workers' members believed that the provision should be discussed in relation to the proposed Recommendation. The amendment was also opposed by the Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Japan, Turkey, the United States and the Member States of the European Communities. The amendment was withdrawn.

216. The Workers' members submitted an amendment with a view to transferring to the Convention a point from the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation (Point 15):

Employers should consult the representatives of the workers concerned on the introduction or extension of part-time work, on the rules and procedures applying to it and on the protective and promotional measures that may be appropriate.

The Workers' members insisted on the fundamental importance, in their view, of consultations with representatives of the workers concerned on the introduction or extension of part-time work and the necessity which ensued of having a provision on this subject included in an ILO instrument having the force of obligation on ratifying member States.

217. The Employers' members were of the opinion that the proposed text would be particularly inappropriate in a Convention, which already referred to the need for consultation in a number of other contexts. One of the inherent advantages of part-time work was the ability of employers to use it to cover the absence or non-availability of full-time workers, often on an urgent basis. If there were a requirement for consultation with the representatives of the workers concerned in such cases, the necessary flexibility, which should characterize recourse to this form of employment, would be severely impaired. The Government member of Canada considered that the proposed wording was an example of best practice and should remain in the Recommendation. The Government members of Australia, Cyprus, Japan, Sweden, Turkey and the United States, and the Member States of the European Communities also opposed the amendment. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

218. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to include the following new Point in the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention:

Transfer from full-time to part-time work should be freely chosen and carry with it the guarantees and conditions of comparable full-time employment. Refusal to transfer from full-time to part-time work should not constitute grounds for dismissal.

The Workers' members expressed the belief that a provision of this type was lacking from the text of the proposed Convention. In practice, situations occurred in which pressure could be placed on full-time workers to transfer to part-time work. It was therefore necessary to ensure that the change from full-time to part-time work was always freely chosen and that the workers who made such transfers continued to enjoy all the guarantees and conditions of the full-time employment relationship. Moreover, the refusal of such a transfer should not constitute grounds for dismissal. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of the Government members of France, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, Spain and Portugal, considered that the new Point was important. An absolute guarantee was needed that the consent of the person concerned was obtained before any full-time worker was transferred to part-time work.

219. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment and stated that when workers chose of their own free will to transfer to part-time work they needed to accept the conditions attached to that form of employment. If such workers enjoyed all the guarantees and conditions pertaining to full-time employment, that would constitute a form of discrimination against full-time workers. The second part of the amendment, under which a refusal to transfer from full-time to part-time work should not constitute grounds for dismissal, was adequately covered by Point 10 (b), which covered termination of employment. It was therefore unnecessary to add a new Point on this subject. The Government member of Germany emphasized that the transfer from full-time to part-time employment should be agreed upon by employers and workers. Nevertheless, the wording of the amendment created serious problems for his country, where these matters were regulated by collective bargaining. The Government member of Austria stated that under all legislative systems the terms set out in a contract of employment could not be changed unilaterally. Where no agreement was reached between the parties concerned, the employer was obliged to declare a "constructive" dismissal, under which another form of employment was offered to the worker, and which was covered by the usual conditions governing the termination of the employment relationship. The Government member of Ireland agreed that in many countries unilateral changes in the contract of employment could be classified as unfair dismissal. However, the proposed text was, in view of the definition of part-time workers in Point 3, all-embracing and therefore inflexible. The Government members of Canada, Cyprus, Denmark, Ireland, Japan, the Netherlands and the Republic of Korea also believed that the proposed new Point would not be appropriate in a Convention. The Government member of Cyprus said that a unilateral change in conditions of employment, such as the transfer without the consent of the worker concerned from full-time to part-time work, would amount to constructive dismissal, against which workers were already adequately protected under national law and practice in many countries. The Government member of Canada added that, although these standards already applied in many countries, it was necessary for the Convention to be flexible enough to apply to countries where they were not in force. Moreover, in difficult economic circumstances, companies sometimes needed a certain flexibility in this respect in order to survive. The Government member of the United Kingdom considered that the proposed text had no place in an instrument on part-time work in so far as it sought to protect full-time workers.

220. In reply, the Workers' members said that the amendment was not intended to cover the question of partial unemployment nor to cause confusion with the other provisions in the proposed Convention. They therefore subamended the text to read as follows:

> Measures should be taken to ensure that transfer from full-time to part-time work or vice versa is freely chosen. Unilateral changes of the agreed number of hours are invalid, and the worker's refusal to transfer should not constitute a valid reason for termination of employment.

The Workers' Vice-Chairperson noted that the last part of the amendment referred to the provision in the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), concerning situations which did not constitute valid reasons for the termination of the employment relationship.

221. The Employers' members indicated that, although they did not disagree with the basic principles underlying the subamendment, they encountered serious difficulties with the inclusion of this idea in a Convention. The language used went beyond the simple transfer from full-time to part-time work and would also cover changes in the hours worked by a part-time worker. They recalled that Article 4 of Convention No. 158 provided that the employment of a worker should not be terminated unless there were valid reasons for such termination based on the operational requirements of the undertaking, establishment or service. In a situation in which an enterprise was experiencing economic problems, difficult choices often had to be made between a reduction in working hours or the dismissal of the employees. The amendment was also opposed by the Government members of Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Denmark, Turkey and the United States.

222. However, the Government member of France considered that the two ideas contained in the amendment were both important. He proposed a new form of wording which read as follows:

> Transfer from full-time to part-time work should be agreed to by the worker. Refusal to transfer from full-time to part-time work should not constitute reasons for sanction.

This was supported by the Government members of Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, Portugal and Spain.

223. The Government member of the Netherlands proposed a different subamendment which would read as follows: "Where appropriate, measures should be taken so that the transfer from full-time to part-time work be freely chosen."

224. Although the wording proposed by the Government member of France was supported by the Workers' members, the Government members of Canada, Egypt, the United Kingdom, the United States and Switzerland expressed a preference for the subamendment submitted by the Government member of the Netherlands as the least objectionable solution which raised the fewest problems.

225. However, the Employer's members opposed both subamendments. The Government member of Germany indicated that the subamendment proposed by the Government member of the Netherlands left unclear the measures which needed to be taken. The question of the transfer of workers from full-time to part-time work should be settled essentially in negotiation between employers and workers and in collective agreements. In order to respond to this objection, the Workers' members proposed to include in the subamendment the words "in accordance with national law and practice."

226. The Employers' members indicated that, although this was not the correct place for a provision of this type, they would reluctantly agree to its conclusion if the Committee accepted the following wording:

> Where appropriate, measures should be taken so that the transfer from full-time to part-time work or vice-versa be freely chosen in accordance with national law and practice and the operational requirements of the establishment concerned.

227. The new Point was adopted as amended.

D. PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS WITH A VIEW TO A RECOMMENDATION

General Provisions

228. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to add, at the end of the Point, the following text:

> provided that a member may, after consulting the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, exclude wholly or partly from its scope particular categories of workers or establishments when its application to them would raise particular problems.

They explained that the intention behind the amendment was to use the same wording which had been included in the Convention. Although a Recommendation was not binding, it had persuasive force and was often used by governments as a basis for legislation. It would therefore be illogical for its scope to differ from that of the Convention.

229. The Workers' members believed that it was not necessary to limit the scope of the Recommendation. In response to their request for clarification with regard to defining the scope of a Convention and a Recommendation which were adopted at the same time on the same subject, the representative of the Secretary-General indicated that ILO practice was not uniform. In certain cases, their scope was defined in exactly the same way in both instruments. In other cases, their scope differed, either because the Recommendation contained none of the exclusions provided for in the Convention, or because these exclusions were more limited.

230. The Government members of Canada, Turkey and the United Kingdom supported the amendment. However, the Government member of Switzerland, as well as the Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Governments of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, supported the Office text.

231. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by 12,201 votes in favour and 14,112 votes against, with 882 abstentions.

232. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the Point. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson considered that the present wording of Point 14 was misleading in its implication that a member State would be obliged to apply the provisions of the Recommendation in conjunction with those of the Convention. In fact, whether or not the Convention had been ratified, there was no obligation upon a member State to apply the provisions of Recommendations.

233. The Workers' members considered that the Office's text was clear and signified that the provisions of the Recommendation were intended to include the provisions of the Convention, without repeating them, and to provide a source of inspiration to member States which had decided to ratify the Convention, concerning measures which could be taken to put into practice the obligations laid down in the Convention. In response to their request for clarification on the meaning of the words "in conjunction with" in Point 14, the representative of the Secretary-General observed that these words were used to convey the idea that the Recommendation was not an isolated instrument and that it made up a coherent set of standards in combination with the Convention. The Recommendation contained two types of provisions: firstly, those which advised member States on the ways in which the obligations contained in the Convention could be implemented; and secondly, provisions which referred to aspects of the protection or the promotion of part-time work which were not dealt with by the Convention.

234. After the Government member of Canada and the Government members of the Member States of the European Communities had expressed opposition to the amendment, the Employers' members withdrew it in favour of an amendment submitted by the Government members of Canada, Japan and the United States, which sought to replace the word "applied" by the word "considered". The Government member of Canada indicated that the amendment was also supported by the Government members of Austria, Finland, Malta, New Zealand, Sweden and Switzerland. The amendment aimed at reflecting the fact that Recommendations provided guidelines which would inspire member States but which imposed no obligations, even on States which ratified the corresponding Convention. The Government members of Antigua and Barbuda, Norway as well as the Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Communities, also favoured the amendment.

235. The representative of the Secretary-General observed that the objective of the International Labour Conference when adopting new standards was that they would eventually be applied in the member States of the ILO. This objective also applied in the case of a Recommendation. The supervisory mechanisms for the application of ILO standards, the Committee of Experts, and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, were not limited to supervising the implementation of ratified Conventions. They also examined, in accordance with article 19 (6) (d) of the ILO Constitution, the measures taken by member States to give effect to the provisions of Recommendations. In other words, a Recommendation was not adopted to be only "considered" by member States. It was adopted in the hope that it would be applied, on the understanding that its application was optional, and not obligatory as in the case of a ratified Convention.

236. In reply, the Government member of Canada indicated that under article 22 of the ILO Constitution member States had reporting obligations in respect of the Conventions which they had ratified, while under article 19 they were called upon to report on the position of their law and practice with regard to the matters dealt with by unratified Conventions and by Recommendations. The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations did not deal with the information provided by governments under these two articles in the same way. The reports requested under article 19 were for information purposes only, whereas those supplied under article 22 permitted the supervisory bodies to assess the extent to which ratified Conventions were implemented. The Government member of Germany added that it was important to understand that the provisions of the Recommendation should be interpreted taking into account the provisions of the Convention. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson recalled that there was no uniform practice in this respect and that the provision contained in this Point was not commonly found in ILO Recommendations.

237. However, the Workers' members preferred the Office text and called on the Legal Adviser for clarifications in this respect. The Legal Adviser explained that the purpose of this provision was to indicate that the Recommendation was not self-contained but had to be read together with the Convention. It represented a fairly new technique in the drafting of standards, designed to avoid the lengthy repetition in the Recommendation of provisions in the Convention. In the present instance, if the Recommendation was to be made fully self-contained, it would be necessary to repeat Points 9 and 10, which were referred to in Points 17 and 19. This technique had already been used in the Chemicals Convention (No. 170) and Recommendation (No. 177), 1991; the latter contained a provision in the same terms as Point 14. This being said, it seemed evident that if a government was considering the Recommendation it would be with a view to its application, and the use of the term "considered" instead of "applied" would not have any legal implications.

238. The Government member of Canada stated that this statement confirmed her belief that there was no legal impediment to the use of the word "considered". The Government member of Austria added that it was necessary for it to be made clear that the ratification of the Convention did not oblige Member States to apply the higher standards contained in the Recommendation. The Employers' members were of the opinion that the term "applied" was inappropriate in the Office's text. However, the Workers' members, after hearing the explanation of the Legal Adviser, did not see any sense in changing the Office text by the adoption of this amendment and preferred to remain with the original wording of the Proposed Conclusions.

239. The amendment was adopted and Point 14 was adopted as amended.

240. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the Point. Although they supported the principle of consultation, it was important that no greater obligation should be created in this respect for part-time workers than for comparable full-time workers. Point 15 required consultation in three separate areas, including the introduction or extension of part-time work. However, there would be practical constraints on consultation if a decision to introduce or extend part-time work in an establishment were of an urgent nature. If the decision were to be delayed, due to prior consultation with workers' representatives, the efficiency of the enterprise could suffer. Another area of consultation concerned the rules and procedures applying to part-time work. These were often laid down in collective bargaining and any additional obligation in this respect would only complicate matters.

241. The Workers' members considered that Point 15 referred to a very important issue which needed to be covered by the proposed new standards. The Government members of Austria, Cyprus and the Member States of the European Communities, also opposed the amendment.

242. In view of the above opposition, the Employers' members withdrew the amendment in favour of another amendment which they had submitted to insert the words "in accordance with national law and practice" at the beginning of the Point. They also submitted an amendment to replace the words "the introduction or extension of part-time work, on the rules and procedures applying to it" by the words "the conditions of part-time work". The proposed wording was intended to recognise the differences in national practice in member States, as well as to take greater account of the operational requirements of the establishments concerned.

243. The Government members of Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Japan and of the Member States of the European Communities supported the addition of the words "in accordance with national laws and practice". The Government member of Austria agreed that it was appropriate for general consultations to take place on the matters covered by Point 15, but considered that there should not be a requirement for consultations each time that a part-time worker was hired. The representative of the Secretary-General confirmed that the intention behind the Office's text was not to create an open-ended requirement for consultation each time the employer decided to hire a part-time worker. The intention was that this consultation should take place on certain important occasions, such as when the employer first considered having recourse to part-time work and if subsequently a substantial increase in this type of employment was planned. The Government member of France added that it was one of the essential functions of the ILO to promote consultation of this type. Moreover, consultation on the introduction or extension of part-time work was particularly necessary in view of the changes in work organization that this involved. The Government member of the United Kingdom believed it was necessary to modify the text in order to emphasize the fact that the requirement for consultation was of a general nature. She therefore proposed to insert the word "general" before the words "introduction or extension". The Employers' members indicated that they could accept this subamendment.

244. The Workers' members emphasized the need for the representatives of workers to be consulted on the introduction and extension of part-time work, as well as on the arrangements pertaining to it. This took on particular importance in States in which part-time work was not yet common, such as the developing countries. It was clear that the requirement for consultation was general and did not apply in the case of individual workers. The Workers' members therefore preferred the Office's text.

245. Put to the vote, the amendment, as subamended, was adopted by 16,464 votes in favour and 11,172 votes against, with 294 abstentions.

246. Point 15 was adopted as amended.

Subtitle preceding Point 16

247. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete the subtitle preceding Point 16, which they believed was not a logical separation of the provisions of the proposed Recommendation. The Employers' members did not oppose an essentially stylistic modification. The amendment was adopted.

Point 16

248. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the Point by the following text:

> In accordance with national laws and practice and to the same extent as comparable full-time workers, part-time workers should be provided with a statement concerning their specific conditions of employment.

The Employers' members expressed serious reservations concerning the concept of a written contract or statement set out in the Office's text. It was unusual for written contracts to be concluded between employers and workers and this provision contained the implicit suggestion that a different practice should be followed for part-time workers, when the guiding principle of the instruments on part-time work was that there should be equivalent treatment for part-time workers and comparable full-time workers. The conditions of employment of workers were mostly covered by agreements, including collective agreements, which were available for the scrutiny of workers. The Employers' members agreed that part-time workers should be provided with information on their conditions of employment and that this should be provided in accordance with national law and practice. However, they should receive no more nor less information than comparable full-time workers.

249. In reply, the Workers' members considered that it was important in this particular respect that part-time workers should be treated differently from full-time workers. In the case of full-time employment, the workers concerned had little difficulty in knowing the conditions under which they were expected to work. However, for part-time workers there could be a large degree of variation in their hours of work and their other conditions of employment, and it was therefore important that these should be specified in writing. Clearly, the contract or statement of conditions of employment should not be contrary to the provisions of the relevant collective agreements. The Workers' members could accept the inclusion of the phrase "in accordance with national laws and practice", which was proposed in the amendment.

250. The Government members of Antigua and Barbuda and Nigeria referred to the situation in their countries, under which workers were entitled in accordance with the law to a written contract or statement of their conditions of employment. They therefore supported the Office's text. However, the Government member of Canada informed the Committee that in her country and in the United States written contracts of employment were uncommon. She did not therefore support a provision which included a new requirement that would only be applied to part-time workers. Although it was important for part-time workers to be provided with the relevant information on their conditions of employment, this could be furnished in either written or verbal form. The Government member of Cyprus agreed that the Office's text for Point 16 implied a form of positive discrimination for part-time workers. In view of the fact that it was the object of the instruments on part-time work to establish equivalent treatment for part- and full-time workers, she expressed support for the amendment submitted by the Employers' members. The Government member of the Netherlands considered that the main preoccupation in relation to part-time workers was their working hours or schedules. However, the Government member of the United Kingdom pointed out that contracts often provide for flexibility in the working hours or schedules at the outset of the employment relationship.

251. The Government member of France said that the importance for part-time workers of being provided with information on the specific conditions of employment which applied to them should not be in conflict with the tradition in many countries of not establishing written contracts of employment. He therefore proposed to subamend the text put forward by the Employers' members to read as follows:

Part-time workers should be informed of their specific conditions of employment by a written document or any other means consistent with national law and practice.

252. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson considered that the subamendment proposed by the Government member of France was almost identical to the amendment put forward by the Employers' members, with the exception that it omitted the phrase "to the same extent as comparable full-time workers".

253. In reply, the Government member of France believed that any inclusion of the idea that the information provided should be the same as for comparable full-time workers would weaken the text, which addressed the particular needs of part-time workers in regard to information on their specific conditions of work. The Workers' members supported the subamendment, in which the phrase "specific conditions of employment" referred to all the conditions of employment of part-time workers, and not only those which differed from the conditions of comparable full-time workers. The subamendment was also supported by the Government members of Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, Italy, Nigeria, Portugal, Switzerland and the United Kingdom.

254. Point 16 was adopted as amended.

255. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace Point 17 by the following text:

The adaptations to be made in accordance with Point 9 above to statutory social security schemes which are based on occupational activity should aim at reducing the risk that part-time workers may be penalized by such schemes.

The Employers' members said that the Office's text of Point 17 raised complex issues. The various references made at different points of the Proposed Conclusions to statutory social security schemes made a rather confused pattern. Moreover, they considered that the various clauses included in the Office's text were of too specific a nature. The amendment was intended to simplify both Point 17 and the text of the instruments as a whole.

256. The Workers' members emphasized the importance of retaining in the Point the concept of the progressive reduction of thresholds, which was also covered by Points 18 and 19. The Committee had adopted in Point 11 of the Proposed Conclusions for the Convention a text which called upon Governments to indicate whether they were giving consideration to the progressive extension of protection to workers who were excluded from the schemes in question. It would therefore be inconsistent if the proposed Recommendation were not to include this idea. After a majority of the Government members had indicated their opposition to the amendment, the Employers' members withdrew it.

257. The Government members of the Member States of the European Communities submitted an amendment to insert the words "if appropriate" at the beginning of Point 17 (a). The Government member of Denmark explained that it was not a realistic aim to expect that the thresholds which existed in social security schemes based on occupational activity could be progressively reduced.

258. The Workers' members considered that the amendment would weaken the text of Point 17 (a). However, the amendment was supported by the Employers' members and a number of Government members. The amendment was adopted.

259. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add, at the end of Point 17 (b), the words: "in order to cover the greatest possible number of part-time workers". The intention of the amendment was to make the objective of Point 17 (b) as specific as possible.

260. The Employers' members considered that the amendment constituted an undesirable extension of the scope of the text and was in contradiction to the decision taken by the Committee on the previous amendment. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

261. The Government members of the Member States of the European Communities submitted an amendment to replace the words "in full" in Point 17 (b) by the words "as appropriate". The Government member of Denmark stated that greater flexibility was required in Point 17 (b) in order to cover the great variety of social security systems in member States. The amendment was also supported by the Employers' members and the Government members of Antigua and Barbuda, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Finland, Japan, Malta, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States.

262. The Workers' members pointed out that the text referred to minimum and flat-rate benefits which, although they did not often exist in developing countries, were widespread in the industrialized countries. It was very important to ensure that part-time workers had equal access to these benefits, which were often of a very low level. They could not conceive that the Governments of the members who had submitted the amendment would adopt a policy to deny these benefits to part-time workers. However, in view of the strong support expressed by the Government members for the amendment, they did not want to ask for an official vote. The amendment was adopted.

263. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add after the words "old age benefits" in Point 17 (b) the words "invalidity benefits, maternity benefits". The Workers' members considered that this Point contained the only reference in the Proposed Conclusions to minimum and flat-rate benefits. The text of the Point had already been weakened by the adoption of the previous amendment, and it would not therefore raise any difficulties to extend its scope to include the very important areas of invalidity and maternity benefits.

264. Although the Employers' members warned that the amendment would constitute an unnecessary complication of the text in view of the broad variations in the schemes providing invalidity and maternity benefits in member States, the amendment received broad support from the Government members. The amendment was adopted.

265. The Government members of Germany, Luxembourg and the United Kingdom submitted an amendment to replace the words "only part-time employment" in Point 17 (c) by the words "part-time work of a reasonable duration and on reasonable grounds". The Government of the United Kingdom noted that in view of the definition of part-time worker which had been adopted and which could cover anything from one to thirty-nine hours of work a week, it was unreasonable to assume that all part-time workers should be eligible to receive unemployment benefits. There needed to be a qualification that the work would be of a reasonable duration in order to become entitled to such benefits. The Government member of Germany added that the Office's text suggested that if part-time workers lost their job, they could insist on seeking only part-time work and could therefore turn down offers of full-time employment. This could lead to unfair results in cases in which similar part-time work was not available, since the workers in question would retain their entitlement to unemployment benefits. However, if the workers were able to demonstrate reasonable grounds for refusing full-time work, such as family responsibilities, this would cause fewer problems. The Employers' members supported the amendment.

266. The Workers' members strongly opposed the amendment, which would create a situation in which unemployed part-time workers, who at best only received very low unemployment benefits, might be compelled to take on full-time employment against their will. They also considered that the issue of thresholds, raised by the Government member of the United Kingdom, was already covered by the fact that Point 17 (c) was confined to a general statement of principle. However, in order to accommodate the concerns expressed by the authors of the amendment, they proposed to subamend the text by adding the words "in principle" after the word "accepting" in the Office's text. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

267. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add after clause 17 (c) the following text:

> accepting that workers who are seeking full-time employment may not be excluded from unemployment benefits if they refuse an offer of part-time work.

They stated that this complemented the previous clause, which covered part-time workers who only sought part-time work. The possibility of full-time workers being able to refuse part-time work had also been covered in the new Point which the Committee had adopted to the text of the proposed Convention. Part-time work should be freely chosen. It should not be forced upon workers who preferred to work on a full-time basis.

268. The Employers' members opposed the amendment on the grounds that the new clause concerned full-time rather than part-time workers. Moreover, the text could be interpreted to cover part-time work which was just below the number of hours worked by full-time workers, with very similar conditions of employment. This could provide an important escape clause for those who did not wish to work and preferred to continue to receive unemployment benefits, which would in turn have a serious impact on the cost of unemployment insurance schemes. After a large number of Government members had expressed opposition to the amendment, it was withdrawn by the Workers members.

269. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add, after the word "reducing" in Point 17 (d), the words "to a minimum". However, after the Employers' members and many Government members indicated their opposition, they withdrew the amendment.

270. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add, at the end of Point 17, the following new clause:

> Part-time workers who have previously gained full access to social security benefits as a result of having worked either full time or above the required thresholds and who return to work on a part-time basis below these thresholds, should retain their accrued rights.

The Workers' members identified a problem which was liable to arise in statutory social security schemes when workers had qualified for coverage during a previous period of employment, but fell below the established thresholds when they returned to work on a part-time basis. They were then penalized by their part-time status.

271. The amendment was opposed by the Employers' members, who considered that it raised some complex issues and only applied to a limited number of member States. In view of the need for the instruments to be of general application, it should not therefore be adopted. The amendment was opposed by the Government members of Antigua and Barbuda, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Finland, Japan, Malta, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States, as well as the Government members of the Member States of the European Communities. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

272. Point 17 was adopted as amended.

273. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the Point by the following text:

Part-time workers who have coverage under private occupational schemes which supplement or replace the statutory social security schemes should be protected by such schemes under conditions which are equitable in relation to those of comparable full-time workers. Where appropriate, these conditions may be determined in proportion to hours of work or contributions.

The Employers' Vice-Chairperson indicated that the amendment retained the principle of equitable treatment for part-time workers in relation to comparable full-time workers. However, it was important that the private occupational schemes in question had the latitude to treat part-time workers slightly differently to comparable full-time workers in some respects. By way of illustration, he referred to qualifying conditions such as minimum periods of service. It would be cumbersome from an administrative point of view for such schemes to have to provide for the access to schemes of part-time workers who only completed a short period of service, who would in any case draw almost no benefit from the scheme.

274. The Workers' members opposed the amendment, which did not retain the idea that the thresholds of private occupational schemes should be progressively reduced to allow part-time workers to be covered as widely as possible. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Finland, Japan, Malta, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States, as well as the Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Governments of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, opposed the amendment. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

275. The Government members of Canada, Japan and the United States submitted an amendment to delete Point 18 (1). The Government member of Canada explained that thresholds were necessary under private occupational schemes. It was not realistic to believe that these could be progressively reduced, especially in cases in which they were already very low. There was a point beyond which the extra costs of covering certain workers were not worth the potential benefits which they might eventually enjoy. However, in view of the fact that the Point was contained in a Recommendation, she withdrew the amendment.

276. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete, in Point 18 (1), the words "which supplement or replace the statutory social security schemes". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson explained that some private occupational schemes did not supplement or replace statutory social security schemes, particularly in developing countries in which social security systems had not yet been established. In such cases, private schemes might provide the only coverage available to the workers in question. The thresholds established by these schemes should also be progressively reduced in order to extend protection to part-time workers. The Government member of Denmark expressed support for the amendment.

277. The Employers' members opposed the amendment on the grounds that there were in practice many private occupational schemes which covered areas unrelated to social security, such as savings schemes. In order to ensure that Point 18 did not cover these schemes, it was important to retain the words which the Workers' members were seeking to delete. The Government members of Canada, Cyprus, Japan and the United Kingdom opposed the amendment. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

278. The Committee agreed, as a consequence of the definition of part-time worker adopted in Point 3, to replace the words "other workers" in Point 18 (2) by the words "comparable full-time workers". Point 18 was adopted as amended.

279. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete Point 19 (1). They explained that this Point once again dealt with the progressive reduction of thresholds affecting the access of part-time workers to protection, which the Committee had shown a reluctance to accept in earlier Points. The Government members of Canada and the United States submitted an identical amendment. The Government member of Canada considered that the commitment for the progressive reduction of threshold requirements contained in Point 19 (1) was absolute and would lead to their total elimination. This was an unrealistic objective. However, she wondered whether the Committee would be able to accept the addition at the beginning of the Office's text of the words "as appropriate". The modified text was supported by the Government members of the Member States of the European Communities.

280. The Workers' members recalled that Point 19 (1) referred to the fundamental areas of protection covered by Point 10, namely maternity protection, termination of employment and paid annual leave and paid public holidays. It was essential that there should be no thresholds in these very important areas. However, they accepted the modified version of the Office's text proposed by the Government member of Canada. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

281. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace Point 19 (2) by the following text:

Appropriate periods of service should be required as a condition for protection in the fields covered by Point 10 above.

The Employers' Vice-Chairperson indicated that the amendment, while not attempting to deny anything to part-time workers, addressed the very important problem of workers who completed only very short periods of service. These were more likely to be part-time than comparable full-time workers. For part-time workers who were employed for very few hours a week, it might be appropriate to establish a longer period of service before they enjoyed the protection in question. He subamended the text by adding the following sentence: "These periods of service should be determined in relation to the periods of service required for comparable full-time workers."

282. The Workers' members did not support the amendment proposed by the Employers' members. The amendment was also opposed by the Government members of Antigua and Barbuda, Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Finland, Japan, Malta, Norway, New Zealand, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States, as well as the Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

283. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace, in Point 19 (2), the words "the periods of service" by the words "the duration of the employment relationship". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson explained that the intention of the amendment was to eliminate an ambiguity from the text. The term "periods of service" could mean both the duration of the employment relationship in terms of periods such as weeks or months, as well as the number of hours or days habitually worked by the person concerned. The Workers' members wanted to ensure that the Point referred to the former. The representative of the Secretary-General indicated that the term "periods of service" had been used in the Office's text to signify the period of time covered by the employment relationship, and not the hours or days worked over that period.

284. The Employers' members considered that the term "periods of service" clearly covered the period of time that the worker had been active in the employment relationship. The expression "duration of the employment relationship" was less precise than the term "periods of service", which did not necessarily include periods of leave, such as military service, illness or career breaks for study purposes. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Finland, Japan, Malta, Norway, New Zealand, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States opposed the amendment. The Government member of Canada pointed out that the term "period of service" was normally understood to mean a continuing employment relationship which could include interruptions for a number of reasons. The Government member of Germany indicated that in his country some entitlements were based on periods of service and others on the hours worked or considered to have been worked. It would therefore be possible to use both terms. The Government member of Argentina suggested that the amendment should read "effective duration of the employment relationship". However, the Workers' members stated that the explanation provided by the representative of the Secretary-General had satisfied their concerns and withdrew the amendment.

285. The Committee agreed, as a consequence of the definition of part-time worker adopted in Point 3, to replace the words "other workers" in Point 19 (2) by the words "comparable full-time workers". Point 19 was adopted as amended.

286. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the word "equitable" by the word "appropriate". The Employers' members reaffirmed their belief that all workers, including part-time workers, should be treated fairly. However, on the question of the financial compensation which was additional to basic wages, there were substantial differences between the working practices of part-time workers and their full-time colleagues. Large numbers of part-time workers, and particularly students, only worked at weekends. Many part-time workers also worked at night or on shift work. Therefore, in the matters covered by Point 20, a simple comparison with full-time workers was not appropriate. The Employers' members also considered that the illustrative list included at the end of the Point should be deleted. They indicated that the Office's text of the Point could be acceptable to them if this list were to be deleted.

287. The Workers' members emphasized that the Office text consisted of a general statement of principles. Although they would have preferred the terms "equal" or "equivalent", they could accept it in its present form. They could also accept the proposal to delete the list of examples. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Japan, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States supported the subamendment. The Committee adopted the subamendment.

288. Point 20 was adopted as amended.

289. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the point by the following text:

Measures should be taken to ensure that, as far as practicable and appropriate, part-time workers have access to the welfare facilities and social services of the establishment concerned.

The Employers' members explained that part-time workers often worked at different hours to their full-time colleagues and at times when their numerical strength might be very different from the normal staffing levels of the establishment concerned. For example, cleaners often worked at times when the other members of the staff were not present. This created evident difficulties in providing them with welfare facilities, such as canteens, on an equitable basis with the rest of the staff. The amendment therefore sought to use the words "as far as practicable and appropriate" in order to cover situations in which it was clearly impracticable to provide such treatment for part-time workers.

290. The Workers' members believed that the words "as far as possible" in the Office's text covered precisely the problems raised by the Employers' members. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Japan, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States also opposed the amendment. The representative of the Secretary-General confirmed that the expression "as far as possible" had been included in the Office's text to cover the measures which could be reasonably asked of employers, and therefore included the concept of what was practicable. However, the Employers' members maintained that while everything was possible, some things were not practicable. The Government members of Antigua and Barbuda, Canada, Cyprus and the United Kingdom indicated that they would accept the replacement of the word "possible" by the word "practicable" in the Office's text. The Workers' members also accepted the change. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

291. Point 21 was adopted as amended.

292. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace Point 22 (1) by the following text:

> When establishing the number and scheduling of hours of work of part-time workers, the employer should, as far as possible, take into account the interests of the workers.

The Employers' members explained that the amendment sought to establish that the number and scheduling of hours was a matter to be determined by the employer, on the basis of the needs of the establishment. Clearly, the interests of part-time workers should be taken into account as far as possible, although they could not always be paramount. The amendment had therefore attempted to retain the principle contained in the Office's text, while remaining within the bounds of the possible. The Government members of Canada and Switzerland supported the amendment.

293. However, the Workers' members believed that the Office's text was well-balanced and took into account both the interests of the workers and the needs of the establishment. The Government member of Antigua and Barbuda and the Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, opposed the amendment. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

294. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add, after the words "be established" in Point 22 (1), the words "by negotiation between the employer and the workers or, where appropriate, the representatives of the workers concerned". The intention of the amendment was to ensure that the number and scheduling of hours of part-time workers were a matter for negotiation. The Workers' members indicated that they could accept a reference to national law and practice in their amendment. The representative of the Secretary-General indicated that the Point had been drafted by the Office with a view to avoiding any specification of the manner in which the number and scheduling of hours of work of part-time workers should be established, since the methods used for this purpose varied from country to country. The Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Governments of Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Italy, Greece, Luxembourg and Spain, supported the amendment.

295. The Employers' members believed that the amendment would lead to impracticable situations in which even very small changes in working hours would have to be covered by negotiations, which would severely limit the flexibility required by enterprises. The Government members of Antigua and Barbuda, Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, France, Japan, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the amendment. In view of this opposition, the Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

296. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete Point 22 (2). They considered that the placing of restrictions on changes in the agreed work schedule and work beyond scheduled hours would directly affect the operational requirements of the establishment concerned. They were particularly concerned at the suggestion contained in the Office's text that restrictions should be imposed in these matters, although they agreed that prior notice should be given of changes in working hours whenever appropriate. However, they withdrew the amendment.

297. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words "to restrictions and" by the words "as far as possible" in Point 22 (2). They believed it was necessary to delete the reference to restrictions and to qualify the concept of prior notice with the expression "as far as possible". It was a matter of common sense that prior notice should be given to workers concerning changes in their work schedules. However, emergency situations arose in which it would be impossible to give such notice. The Government member of Japan supported the amendment. She believed that a general agreement between the part-time worker and the employer at the time of the employment contract with regard to overtime may also be another relevant procedure.

298. The Workers' members considered that the Office text was a statement of principle, similar to the one contained in the Recommendation on Workers with Family Responsibilities, 1981 (No. 165), and as such suited the form of a Recommendation. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States, preferred the Office's text. The Government member of Canada considered that it was a general statement which put forward a valid principle. However, since it might not be possible to apply the principle in an absolute sense, she proposed to subamend the text by adding the words "as far as possible" at the beginning of the phrase. The Government member of Austria agreed that restrictions should be applied to changes in the agreed work schedule as far as possible, although it would not always be possible to give prior notice of such changes. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, supported the proposed addition. The Office's text was adopted as modified.

299. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add after the word "restrictions" in Point 22 (2), the words "and to negotiations between the employer and the representatives of the workers concerned". They believed that changes to the agreed work schedule should be a subject of negotiations. The amendment was opposed by the Employers' members and the Government members of Antigua and Barbuda, Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Japan, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

300. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete Point 22 (3). Having explained that their objection was to the wording of the Office's text, rather than the principle contained in it, they withdrew the amendment. They also submitted an amendment to replace Point 22 (3) by the following text:

Any compensation for work beyond the agreed work schedule should be established in the light of national law and practice.

The amendment did not seek to detract from the principle of the payment of compensation for work which was performed in addition to the agreed work schedule. This matter was often covered by national law, or by collective agreements at the national or sectoral level. In the case of part-time workers, it might be the case that work beyond the agreed schedule would not be compensated at a higher rate. A special overtime rate might only be payable for work beyond normal full-time hours. The amendment sought to avoid the implication that a special hourly rate would apply in all circumstances for work which was performed in addition to the agreed work schedule of part-time workers. Moreover, the Office's text contained an implication that local level negotiations would be required in each case. The amendment sought to include negotiations at all levels.

301. The Workers' members expressed consternation that the Employers' members were not prepared to accept that the system of compensation for additional hours should be negotiated in the normal way, in the manner adopted by the law and practice in many countries, and particularly as set out in a number of fundamental ILO standards. The question of the rates payable for hours beyond the agreed work schedule was a natural subject for negotiation. Following a request for clarification from the Government member of Cyprus, the representative of the Secretary-General indicated that when formulating the wording of clause 22 (3), the Office had taken into account the fact that, in contrast with the overtime hours worked by full-time workers, the hours worked by part-time workers in addition to the agreed work schedule were covered by legal provisions in only a very few countries. The Office could therefore hardly recommend the adoption of legislative measures on this question. It therefore confined itself to recommending that negotiations should take place at the establishment concerned, without specifying the results which should be achieved by these negotiations. It was entirely possible, for example, that such negotiations would exclude from higher rates workers who only worked six hours a week and were called upon to work a seventh. The Office text therefore left it to the wisdom of the parties concerned to decide, through negotiation, the circumstances in which and the thresholds above which additional hours to the agreed schedule should be recompensed, and the level of this compensation.

302. In view of the implication contained in the Office's text that negotiations could be at the local or enterprise level, the Government member of Canada supported the amendment. The Government member of Antigua and Barbuda referred to the situation of workers who were not covered by a collective bargaining unit. In these cases, their system of compensation depended on national law, as set out in the amendment. The Government member of Austria criticized the Office's text for making no distinction between the rates of compensation applicable to the additional hours performed by part-time workers over and above the agreed schedule and the higher rates which were applicable to the overtime hours worked by full-time workers. The Workers' members proposed to modify the Office's text by including the words "according to national law and practice" at the end of the text. The Office text was adopted as modified.

303. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and United Kingdom submitted an amendment to replace the words "the representatives of the workers concerned" in Point 22 (3) by the words "the workers or their representatives". The Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the authors of the amendment, considered that it was natural for workers to be directly concerned in the negotiations in question, particularly in small enterprises and in situations in which they were not covered by collective agreements. The amendment was supported by the Employers' members, and the Government members of Antigua and Barbuda, Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Japan, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States.

304. The Workers' members feared that the proposed text implied that employers would be free to choose whether they wished to bargain at the collective level or negotiate with individual workers. On the understanding that the wording did not imply this choice, they did not oppose the amendment. The amendment was adopted.

305. Point 22 was adopted as amended.

306. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace Point 23 by the following text:

Part-time workers should have appropriate access to forms of leave available to comparable full-time workers in the establishment or branch of activity concerned, in accordance with national law and practice.

Although the Employers' members supported the principle of workers having access to various forms of leave, they believed it was not desirable to enumerate them in the text of the proposed Recommendation. Furthermore, in this case, it was desirable to include the notion of comparability with full-time workers. Part-timers should have appropriate access to the leave available to comparable full-time workers in accordance with national law and practice. The Government member of Antigua and Barbuda supported the amendment.

307. The Workers' members could agree to the inclusion of the concepts of "comparable full-time workers" and "in accordance with national law and practice". However, in a text which was already fairly weak, they could not agree to the change from the term "on an equitable basis" to the idea of "appropriate access". It would also be preferable to retain the enumeration of the various types of leave in order to provide more specific guidance in this context in the Recommendation. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Japan, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, the United States and of the Member States of the European Communities, agreed to the inclusion in the Office's text of the words "comparable full-time workers" and "in accordance with national law and practice". The Office's text was adopted as modified.

308. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the Point. They considered that the patterns of work of part-time workers differed from those of other workers, and even from comparable full-time workers, in respect of work on customary rest days and public holidays. In some trades, such as the retail industry, these were the days of peak activity, on which part-time work was particularly prevalent. Moreover, part-time workers often replaced full-time workers who were on annual leave.

309. In reply, the Workers' members considered that the Employers' members were referring only to part-time workers employed under more casual forms of employment relationship. They recalled that the Office's text was very general, covered part-time workers under any type of employment relationship and was flexible enough to be broadly acceptable. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Japan, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States expressed a preference for the Office text. The Government member of Canada pointed out that part-time work occurred not only in the private sector, but also in the public sector where general principles concerning annual leave and work on customary rest days and public holidays applied to both part- and full-time workers. The Government members of the Member States of the European Communities, as well as the Government member of Antigua and Barbuda also opposed the amendment. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

310. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace Point 24 by the following text:

> Arrangements appropriate to national law and practice should apply to part-time workers in respect of scheduling of annual leave and of work on customary rest days and public holidays.

The Employers' members considered that the arrangements concerning the annual leave of part-time workers should be appropriate to national law and practice, but should not be the same as those which applied to other workers, and particularly to full-time workers. However, after the Workers' members had expressed opposition to the amendment, it was withdrawn by its authors. The Committee agreed to replace the words "other workers" by the words "comparable full-time workers".

311. Point 24 was adopted as amended.

312. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the Point by the following text:

> Where practicable, taking into account the needs of the establishment as well as national law and practice, measures should be taken to overcome constraints on the access of part-time workers to training, career opportunities and occupational mobility.

The Employers' members emphasized the need to introduce an element of practicability, as well as a reference to national law and practice, with regard to the principle of the access of part-time workers to training, career opportunities and occupational mobility. Part-time workers sometimes worked for very few hours a week, and the question of training and career opportunities had to take into account the hours which they spent in work. It would not be possible to overcome constraints on the access of part-time workers to these opportunities unless sufficient recognition were given to the operational needs of the establishment. The proposed text was therefore both more practicable and flexible. The Government member of Antigua and Barbuda supported the amendment.

313. In reply, the Workers' members recalled that the Recommendation should state general objectives which it would be desirable to achieve in the future. The Office's text was already sufficiently flexible to take into account the concerns expressed by the Employers' members. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Japan, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States, opposed the amendment. However, the Government member of Canada could accept a subamendment which replaced the word "all" in the Office's text by the words "where practicable". The Employers' members, as well as the Government members of Turkey and the United Kingdom, supported the subamendment. In reply to a question by the Government members of the Member States of the European Communities, the representative of the Secretary-General specified that the word "training" in Point 25 referred to training related to employment. The Government member of France supported the Office's text in its original version. The Government member of Germany considered that it would be impracticable to provide training on a part-time basis, since the courses would take much longer to complete than standard training programmes. The Committee adopted the amendment as subamended.

314. Point 25 was adopted as amended.

Deletion of the subtitle before Point 26

315. The Committee accepted the proposal made by the Workers' members to delete the subtitle before Point 26.

Point 26

316. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace Point 26 by the following text:

Consideration should be given to the provisions of statutory social security schemes which may discourage recourse to or acceptance of part-time work.

The Employers' members were of the opinion that the Office's text of Point 26 was complex and gave rise to difficult issues, as well as implying an obligation to adapt statutory social security schemes. The amendment put forward the principle in a more general manner.

317. The amendment was opposed by the Workers' members and the Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, France, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Malta, Norway, Switzerland and the United States. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

318. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert the words "freely chosen" after the words "acceptance of" in Point 26. The purpose of the amendment was to bring the text into line with the principle upheld throughout the proposed instruments that part-time work should be freely chosen.

319. The Employers' members considered that it would be inappropriate to include the notion of "freely chosen" part-time work in the context of statutory social security schemes. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Japan, Malta, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States opposed the amendment. The Government member of Cyprus believed that the notion of freely chosen part-time work was already implicit in the text. The Government member of France considered that the term "freely chosen" did not serve any purpose in relation to the remaining provisions of Point 26. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

320. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom submitted an amendment to replace the word "proportionately" in Point 26 (a) by the word "significantly". The Government member of Germany explained that ceilings were necessary in many statutory social security schemes in order to enable them to operate on a sound basis. If the possibility of adopting such ceilings were eliminated, countries which were considering the establishment of social security schemes for the first time might be discouraged.

321. After a request from the Workers' members to clarify the use of the word "proportionately", the representative of the Secretary-General explained that social security schemes usually required the payment of contributions on the basis of only a part of the wage received by workers. The wages of part-time workers were generally below these ceilings, which meant that the contributions paid by part-time workers were based on their total wage. In contrast, part of the wages of full-time workers often lay above the ceiling and were therefore exempt from contributions. As a result, the proportion of the wage of part-time workers paid in contributions was higher than that of full-time workers. The same applied to the contributions paid by employers for these categories of workers. The Government member of Denmark withdrew the amendment.

322. The Government member of Japan, as well as the Government members of Belgium, Germany, Italy, Luxembourg and the United Kingdom, submitted amendments to delete Point 26 (b). The Government member of Japan understood that in several countries a system had been established under which unemployed workers who were seeking full-time employment, but who accepted part-time work, were provided with compensatory benefits through the unemployment insurance scheme. This type of scheme did not exist in many countries, including her own, and she therefore considered that it would be better to delete the paragraph. The Government member of Germany indicated that under the unemployment insurance system in his country, a person who accepted part-time employment of 18 hours per week or more was no longer considered to be available for further employment and would therefore forfeit entitlement to unemployment benefits.

323. In response to a request for clarification, the representative of the Secretary-General recalled that clauses (a), (b) and (c) of Point 26 had been included as illustrations of aspects of social security in respect of which adaptations would be particularly appropriate. The adaptations suggested in clause (b) evidently did not concern countries in which there was no unemployment insurance scheme. In the case of unemployed persons who agreed to take on a part-time job on a temporary basis while still seeking full-time employment, they implied that the income from the part-time job would be supplemented by benefits provided by the unemployment insurance fund in order to ensure that the workers concerned had an incentive to take up employment.

324. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson did not accept that people who were already working should be entitled to unemployment benefits. He therefore supported the amendment. The Government member of the United Kingdom also supported the amendment and commented that unemployment benefits in her country were intended to provide support for persons without work, not to subsidize part-time earnings. The definition of "part-time worker" which had been adopted by the Committee included all part-time workers whose working hours were lower than comparable full-time workers, including those whose working hours were near to full-time hours, for whom this subsidy would be inappropriate.

325. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Malta, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States noted that the Office's text referred only to provisions which excessively reduced the unemployment insurance benefits of the workers concerned. Since the Recommendation was not a prescriptive instrument, they could support the Office's text. The Government member of Spain described the system of partial unemployment benefits in his country. The incentive provided by the provision of partial unemployment benefits to workers who would accept part-time work was logical and just, since most of the workers who took on part-time work, at least in his country, did so because they could not find full-time work.

326. Put to the vote, the amendments were rejected by 161,727 votes in favour and 187,523 votes against, with 9,212 abstentions.

327. Point 26 was adopted without change.

Point 27

328. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the introductory phrase in Point 27 (1) by the following words: "Consideration should be given by employers to". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson explained that, although the Employers' members did not object to the principle that consideration should be given to requests by workers for transfer from full-time to part-time jobs or vice versa with the same employer, it was important to make it clear that it was the employer who would give such consideration. In addition, it did not seem necessary to refer to "special" consideration. In the light of the other amendments before the Committee, he proposed to subamend the amendment to insert "where appropriate" at the beginning of the phrase.

329. The Workers' members preferred the Office's text, which was broader and could encourage governments to give consideration to these matters, although requests for transfer would of course be addressed to employers. They did not see any need to further qualify the provision by adding "where appropriate", although they could accept the new wording proposed by the Government members of the Member States of the European Communities to provide that "employers should consider favourably" requests for transfer.

330. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Japan, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, the United States, and the Government members of the Member States of the European Communities, supported the amendment as subamended by the Employers' members. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

331. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add a provision after Point 27 (1) (b) aimed at giving priority to part-time workers for transfer from part-time jobs to full-time jobs that become available with the same employer, and if necessary to provide appropriate training. She noted that this practice already existed in some establishments and explained that training might be necessary in order to enable part-time workers to take up opportunities for full-time work.

332. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson, opposing the amendment, considered that it was inconsistent with the text of Point 27 (1) (b) as already accepted by the Committee, which only required that consideration be given by employers, where appropriate, to requests for transfer to full-time jobs. It would be quite inappropriate to give priority in such cases to part-time workers, since the test when filling vacancies was suitability for the work. Indeed, the reference made in the amendment to training recognised that part-time workers might not have the necessary skills for full-time vacancies which became available. The question of access to training had already been dealt with in Point 25 and should not be reintroduced in this Point.

333. The Government members of Antigua and Barbuda, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Japan, Luxembourg, Malta, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the amendment. In response to a suggestion by the Workers' Vice-Chairperson that the requirement for priority could be limited to "the same or similar full-time work" and that the reference to training could be deleted, the Government member of Cyprus noted that when filling full-time vacancies employers would normally prefer to transfer workers whose abilities were already known to them. However, there should be no obligation on employers to give priority in cases where the part-time worker was unsuitable for the work. The Government member of Norway, while fully agreeing with the principle that employers should show concern for their workers, supported the views expressed by the previous speaker. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment.

334. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace paragraph (2) by a new clause of paragraph (1) as follows:

the provision of information to the workers on the availability of part-time and full-time provisions within the establishment.

This was aimed at removing the mandatory nature of the Office text concerning the provision of information to workers on the availability of part-time and full-time positions. The amendment also removed the requirement for the "timely" provision of information and reflected the fact that the provision of information would take place within the establishment concerned. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson explained that an enterprise which had many separate establishments could not be expected to circulate information throughout the enterprise on vacant positions in all of its establishments. He added that it was not feasible to create a separate class of information solely for part-time workers: such information would have to be provided to all workers.

335. The Workers' members preferred the Office's text, which they considered to be important in facilitating the transfer from part-time to full-time work. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson added that it was implicit that the information to be provided on the availability of positions was limited to the establishment.

336. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Finland, Japan, Malta, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States preferred the Office's text. However, in consideration of the explanations provided by the Employers' Vice-Chairperson, the Government member of Canada did not object to inserting the words "within the establishment" in the Office text. The Government member of Denmark, the Employers' members and the Workers' members accepted this proposal. The amendment as subamended was adopted.

337. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson, in presenting an amendment aimed at giving protection against termination of employment to workers who refused to transfer from full-time to part-time work, reminded the Committee that a new provision with a similar aim had been inserted in the Convention. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson recalled that the new Point on this issue had been adopted in the Convention after lengthy discussion. It should not be called into question by a provision on the same subject in the Recommendation which used different language. He also noted that the text adopted in the Convention contained the expression "in accordance with national law and practice", whereas this was omitted from the text under consideration. It was unnecessary to insert this provision in the Recommendation, since the matter had been dealt with adequately in the Convention.

338. The Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, proposed a subamendment to insert the following new paragraph:

Solely the fact of the refusal to transfer from full-time to part-time work should not constitute grounds for dismissal. This is without prejudice to dismissals for economic, organizational or technical reasons.

She explained that the purpose of the subamendment was to complement the text adopted in the Convention. While she could not accept the amendment submitted by the Workers' members, she expected that this subamendment should meet many of the Employers' concerns. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Finland, Japan, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States opposed the amendment submitted by the Workers' members. While the Government member of Canada understood the concerns of the Employers' members, she thought that the last sentence of the subamendment submitted by the Government members of the Member States of the European Communities might meet some of those concerns. The Government member of Norway supported the subamendment. However, the Government members of Cyprus and the United Kingdom, considering that the issue had been dealt with adequately in the Convention, and that at any rate workers were in many countries sufficiently protected from unilateral changes in their conditions of employment, opposed the amendment since it could lead to confusion as regards the protection provided by the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158).

339. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson, accepting the subamendment, pointed out that, while some countries' legislation already gave protection to workers who refused to transfer from full-time to part-time work, the law in many other countries provided no such protection. She noted that the intention of the subamendment was to deal with termination of employment on the grounds of refusal to transfer from full-time to part-time work in the same way as the other grounds for dismissal which were declared by Convention No. 158 not to be valid reasons for termination of employment. She suggested that it might be advisable to use the same terminology as that used in Convention No. 158.

340. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted by a vote of 5,264 in favour and 3,619 against, with 235 abstentions.

341. The Workers' members submitted another amendment to Point 27 to add the following new paragraph:

Measures should be taken to facilitate access to freely chosen part-time jobs at all levels of the enterprise, including skilled and managerial jobs.

The Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized the importance of facilitating access to part-time jobs at all levels, and not just at the lowest levels in an establishment, where most part-time workers were concentrated. It had been well established in certain industrialized countries that managerial jobs could be done on a part-time basis. This should be reflected in the Recommendation.

342. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson appreciated the intention behind the proposal and indicated that, with some amendments, the Employers' members could support it. Firstly, "freely chosen" was superfluous in the context of facilitating access to part-time jobs. Secondly, the reference to jobs "at all levels" of the enterprise already included skilled and managerial jobs, but if these were mentioned specifically problems could arise in cases where it was not possible for managerial jobs to be done on a part-time basis. He added that the reference to skilled and managerial jobs was only a partial listing of the types of jobs to which access on a part-time basis might be facilitated. The deletion of those two parts of the amendment would result in a more concise and easily-understood text.

343. The Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Ireland, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, proposed a subamendment to reflect that measures to facilitate access to part-time work should be "considered by employers". This emphasized that such decisions were taken in the context of the establishment. The Government member of Canada indicated that her Government and those of Australia, Cyprus and the United States could accept this subamendment. She considered that the Employers' concerns about the reference to skilled and managerial jobs were valid, but noted that this reference was for illustrative purposes and did not impose an obligation: the reference should therefore be retained. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson could accept the subamendment if "where appropriate" were added at the end of the phrase. Although the authors of the original amendment and of the subamendment considered that this weakened the text, they were prepared to accept it. The amendment as subamended was adopted to read:

Measures should be considered by employers to facilitate access to part-time jobs at all levels of the enterprise, including skilled and managerial jobs where appropriate.

344. Point 27 was adopted as amended.

345. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the reference to a "right", which they considered inappropriate in the context, by the notion of employers giving consideration to requests by workers to transfer to part-time work and subsequently to return to full-time work in justified cases. The discussion on Point 27 had made it clear that the issue in question was the degree of consideration to be given by employers, rather than the rights of workers. The amendment also placed the issue of transfers to part-time work and the return to full-time work in the context of the needs of the establishment. Finally, it deleted the examples which were given in the Office text, which were not helpful.

346. The Workers' members supported the intent of the Office text, although they had proposed some slight amendments to it. They opposed the amendment. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that preferential treatment, and not simply "consideration", was warranted. However, the Workers' members had doubts about the use of the words "in justified cases" and also about the usefulness of the examples included in the Office text. In this context, they sought reassurance from the Office that the proposed text would not undermine existing rights. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that in a number of countries, for example, legislation in accordance with the Maternity Protection Recommendation, 1952 (No. 95), recognized the right of women workers to transfer to a more suitable job: this right would not be affected by the Point under consideration.

347. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Japan, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States, pointed out that the proviso "where national or establishment level conditions permit" in the Office text provided a great deal of flexibility. Noting that the examples of justified cases were useful in a period of growing awareness, not only in industrialized countries, of the need to reconcile work with family responsibilities, and pointing out that the text would form part of a Recommendation and would not therefore be binding, they opposed the amendment. The Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, found the text proposed by the Office to be well-balanced and opposed the amendment.

348. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that while the Maternity Protection Recommendation gave specific protection to workers concerning transfer to other jobs in the case of pregnancy, this protection did not extend to the other examples listed in Point 28. It would therefore create confusion to link requests for transfer on the grounds of pregnancy with requests based on the need to care for a young child or a disabled or sick dependant. He underlined that "right" was an absolute term, not capable of qualification, and was therefore inappropriate in this context: this concern seemed to have been understood by the Workers' members. He was, however, prepared to subamend the amendment submitted by the Employers' members so as to refer to "preferential consideration".

349. The Workers' members, on the basis of the explanation given by the representative of the Secretary-General, withdrew the amendment which they had submitted to Point 28 and were willing to support the Office's text. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment.

350. Point 28 was adopted without change.

351. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete Point 29, which they considered to be discriminatory against part-time workers and damaging to the general concept of equal treatment for part-time workers. While the Office text had recognized that it would not be appropriate to give part-time workers less weight than full-time workers in relation to occupational health and safety, other obligations should also be treated in the same way. The expectation should be reversed, so that only in exceptional cases would part-time workers not count in full. Far from removing a disincentive to the employment of part-time workers, the Office's text would give employers an incentive not to facilitate the transfer of part-time workers to full-time work. It had not been proven that counting part-time workers on an equal basis with full-time workers constituted a disincentive or barrier to part-time employment in practice. Moreover, no convincing reasons had been given for the need to include such a provision in the Recommendation. The trend in European countries, including for example in the Netherlands, in relation to legislation on works councils, was to consider the deletion of such discriminatory provisions. Given the highly controversial nature of the provision, as well as its lack of precision, it should be deleted.

352. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson, noting that the Committee had already discussed the issues involved in the context of the proposed Convention, pointed out that in many countries in which legal obligations of employers depended on the number of employees, thresholds had been established so as to avoid unduly onerous obligations on small enterprises. These were particularly relevant to part-time work, since many small enterprises, especially in the services sector, employed part-time workers. Counting part-time workers as equal to full-time workers would put these small enterprises at a serious disadvantage and would constitute an impediment to the availability of part-time work. He added that legislation in several countries already provided that part-time workers should be counted proportionately. The Office text allowed governments to make practical decisions based on operational requirements. Nevertheless, in the case of occupational safety and health, it would not be appropriate to give part-time workers less weight.

353. The Government members of Canada, Cyprus, Finland, Malta, New Zealand, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States opposed the amendment. The Government member of Canada recalled that the objective of Point 29, as explained in Report V (2), was to avoid disincentives to part-time work. The Government member of Japan pointed out that such measures were not necessary in all countries. She supported the amendment since it was based on the principle of equality. The Government member of France did not consider that the Office text constituted discrimination against part-time workers, since it was fair and sensible to take working time into account in determining employers' obligations.

354. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by 3,901 in favour and 4,982 against, with 188 abstentions.

355. The Government members of the Member States of the European Communities submitted an amendment to replace the word "should" by the word "may" so as to provide an option, in the light of national practice, to give less weight to part-time workers without imposing an obligation to this effect. This was based on some of the same concerns which lay behind the amendment submitted by the Workers' members.

356. The Employers' members considered that the amendment did not properly reflect their concerns about unduly heavy obligations on small employers and the consequential disincentives to part-time work which might result from counting part-time workers on an equal basis as full-time workers in determining the application of certain obligations to employers. Furthermore, replacement of the word "should" by "may" would mean that the text would no longer constitute a proper recommendation to governments, since "may" did not indicate a preference. The Employers' members therefore opposed the amendment.

357. The Workers' members and the Government members of Antigua and Barbuda, Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Finland, Japan, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States, supported the amendment. The amendment was adopted.

358. Point 29 was adopted as amended.

Point 30

359. Amendments submitted by the Government members of Austria and Sweden to delete Point 30 were withdrawn. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson then proposed to respond to all of the remaining amendments which had been submitted to Point 30 by proposing a new text as follows:

Information should be disseminated on the protective measures that apply to part-time work and on practical arrangements for various part-time work schemes.

360. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson agreed with part of the new text, including the deletion of the word "widely" to describe the dissemination of information. In view of the reference in Point 12 as adopted by the Committee to "research and dissemination of information on the degree to which part-time work responds to the economic and social aims of employers and workers", some reference at least to economic and social aspects was necessary. Such a formulation, which was more neutral than a reference to the advantages of part-time work, should not be contentious. Finally, while he could understand why the Workers' members sought to delete a reference to promotional measures, he reminded the Committee that Point 15 referred to "the protective and promotional measures that may be appropriate". There was therefore no basis to delete a comparable reference in Point 30. The new text proposed by the Workers' members would, with the amendments which he had put forward, be consistent with the Committee's previous decisions and would adopt a neutral tone.

361. The Government member of Canada, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Canada, New Zealand and the United States, which had submitted two amendments to Point 30, withdrew these in favour of the new text proposed by the Workers' members. She indicated that the Government members of Australia, Cyprus, Finland, Japan, Malta, Norway, Switzerland and Turkey also supported the new text. However, she could not support the subamendments proposed by the Employers' members, particularly since the Government of Canada did not support references to measures to promote part-time work. She pointed out in this context that Point 15 was directed only at employers, whereas Point 30 was also addressed to governments. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Portugal and Spain also supported the new text proposed by the Workers' members and opposed the subamendments suggested by the Employers' members. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

362. Point 30 was adopted as amended.

Adoption of the Report, Proposed Conclusions and a Resolution

363. At its twelfth sitting, the Committee adopted its Report, subject to the changes requested by its members.

364. At the same sitting, the Committee adopted the Proposed Conclusions as presented at the end of the Report. The Reporter explained that the Drafting Committee had confined itself to making purely linguistic improvements which did not change the meaning of the Conclusions. However, she pointed out that it had modified slightly the wording of Point 10, presented as Point 8 in Report V (2), concerning the basic wages of part-time workers, which had not been clear in the version adopted by the Committee.

365. The Committee also adopted a Resolution to place on the agenda of the next Ordinary Session of the Conference an item entitled "Part-time Work". The proposed Resolution envisaged that this item should be included on the agenda of the Conference "for a second discussion with a view to the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation concerning part-time work." However, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson recalled the opposition expressed by the Employers' members to the adoption of instruments on part-time work. Although they recognized that progress had been made by the Committee towards the adoption of more flexible texts, they still considered that a Convention and a Recommendation, and particularly a Convention, should not be adopted on part-time work. They therefore proposed to amend the wording of the Resolution by replacing the words "with a view to the adoption" by the more neutral formulation "regarding the proposed adoption". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the first and second Conclusions adopted by the Committee specified that the International Labour Conference should adopt standards on part-time work and that these standards should take the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. The wording proposed by the Employers' members would be in contradiction to the decisions of the Committee reflected in the those Conclusions. However, in reply to a request by the Workers' members for clarification, the representative of the Secretary-General said that, in his opinion, the wording proposed by the Employers' members would be without prejudice to the decision to be taken by the Committee next year concerning the form of the instruments to be adopted. The Government member of Canada confirmed that, in her view, the proposed wording did not affect the Conclusions adopted by the Committee. The Government member of Antigua and Barbuda supported the change proposed by the Employers' members, which would make the Resolution more flexible. The Workers' members said that they saw no necessity for the change, particularly in view of the opinions expressed that it would be without prejudice to the decisions of the Committee. However, with a view to maintaining the constructive spirit shown by the Committee throughout its work, they were prepared to accept the change. The Committee adopted the wording proposed by the Employers' members.

366. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson congratulated the Chairperson, the Reporter, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson and the members of the Committee for the positive atmosphere in which the work of the Committee had been carried out. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson associated herself with the words of the previous speaker and hoped that the Committee would continue to work in the same constructive and cooperative manner during the second discussion of the item. The Government member of Canada, as well as the Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Communities, thanked the members of the Committee for the way in which they had contributed to the positive and friendly atmosphere which had laid a good foundation for the second discussion of the item. All the above speakers praised the efficient manner in which the representative of the Secretary-General and his staff had supported the work of the Committee. Finally, the Chairperson thanked all the members of the Committee for the manner in which they had assisted him in his task of ensuring the smooth running of the Committee.

367. The Report of the Committee, the Proposed Conclusions and the Resolution to place on the agenda of the next Ordinary Session of the Conference an item entitled "Part-time work" are submitted for consideration.

Proposed conclusions

A. FORM OF THE INSTRUMENTS

1. The International Labour Conference should adopt standards on part-time work.

2. These standards should take the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.

B. PREAMBLE

3. The Preamble should take note of the relevance, for part-time workers, of the provisions of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951, the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958, the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981, the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984, and the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988.

4. The Preamble should recognise the importance of productive and freely chosen employment for all workers, the economic importance of part-time work and the need to ensure protection for part-time workers in the areas of working conditions, access to employment and social security.

C. DEFINITION AND MEANS OF APPLICATION

5. (1) For the purposes of these standards:

(a) the term "part-time worker" should mean an employed person whose normal hours of work are less than the normal hours of work of comparable full-time workers;

(b) the normal hours of work referred to in clause (a) may be weekly or calculated on average over a given period of employment;

(c) the term "comparable full-time workers" refers to full-time workers:

  (i) in the establishment or branch of activity concerned;

  (ii) with the same type of employment relationship as the part-time worker concerned and the same or a similar type of work or occupation.

(2) The definition of "part-time worker" should not apply to full-time workers affected by partial unemployment, that is a collective and temporary reduction in normal hours of work for economic, technical or structural reasons.

6. The standards should not affect more favourable provisions applicable to part-time workers under other international labour Conventions.

7. The standards should be applied by laws or regulations, except in so far as effect is given to them by means of collective agreements or in any other manner consistent with national practice. The most representative organizations of employers and workers should be consulted before any such laws or regulations are adopted.

D. PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS WITH A VIEW TO A CONVENTION

8. (1) The Convention should apply to all part-time workers, provided that a Member may, after consulting the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, exclude wholly or partly from its scope particular categories of workers or of establishments when its application to them would raise particular problems of a substantial nature.

(2) Each Member having ratified the Convention which avails itself of the possibility afforded in the preceding paragraph should, in its reports on the application of the Convention under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, indicate any particular category of workers or of establishments thus excluded and the reasons why this exclusion was or is still judged necessary.

9. Measures should be taken to ensure that part-time workers receive the same protection accorded to comparable full-time workers in respect of:

(a) the right to organize, to bargain collectively and to act as workers' representatives;

(b) occupational safety and health;

(c) discrimination in employment and occupation.

10. Measures appropriate to national law and practice should be taken to ensure that part-time workers do not, solely because they work part-time, receive a basic wage which is lower than the basic wage of comparable full-time workers, calculated proportionately.

11. Statutory social security schemes which are based on occupational activity should be adapted to the occupational circumstances of part-time workers so that these workers enjoy equivalent conditions to those of comparable full-time workers. Where appropriate, these conditions may be determined by reference to hours of work, contributions or earnings.

12. Measures should be taken to ensure that part-time workers receive equivalent conditions to those of comparable full-time workers in the fields of:

(a) maternity protection;

(b) termination of employment;

(c) paid annual leave and paid public holidays,

it being understood that pecuniary entitlements might be determined in proportion to hours of work or earnings.

13. (1) A Member may exclude from the scope of any of the schemes referred to under Point 11, except those providing employment injury benefits, and of any of the measures taken in the fields mentioned under Point 12, part-time workers whose earnings or hours of work are below specified thresholds, which should be sufficiently low not to exclude an unduly large percentage of part-time workers.

(2) A Member which avails itself of the possibility in paragraph (1) above should:

(a) periodically review the thresholds in force;

(b) in its reports on the application of the Convention under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, indicate the thresholds in force, the reasons therefor and whether consideration is being given to the progressive extension of protection to the workers excluded.

(3) The most representative organizations of employers and workers should be consulted on the establishment, review or revision of the thresholds referred to in paragraph (1).

14. (1) Measures should be taken to facilitate access to productive and freely chosen part-time work which meets the needs of both employers and workers, provided that the protection referred to in Points 9 to 12 above is ensured.

(2) These measures should include:

(a) the review of laws and regulations that may prevent or discourage recourse to or acceptance of part-time work;

(b) the use of employment services, where they exist, to identify and publicize possibilities for part-time work in their information and placement activities;

(c) special attention, in employment policies, to the needs and preferences of specific groups such as the unemployed, workers with family responsibilities, older workers, workers with disabilities and workers undergoing education or training.

(3) These measures may also include research and dissemination of information on the degree to which part-time work responds to the economic and social aims of employers and workers.

15. Where appropriate, measures should be taken to ensure that transfer from full-time to part-time work or vice versa is freely chosen, in accordance with national law and practice and the operational requirements of the establishment concerned.

E. PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS WITH A VIEW TO A RECOMMENDATION

16. The Recommendation should apply to all part-time workers.

17. The provisions of the Recommendation should be considered in conjunction with those of the Convention.

18. In accordance with national law and practice, employers should consult the representatives of the workers concerned on the general introduction or extension of part-time work, on the rules and procedures applying to it and on the protective and promotional measures that may be appropriate.

19. Part-time workers should be informed of their specific conditions of employment in writing or by any other means consistent with national law and practice.

20. The adaptations to be made in accordance with Point 11 above to statutory social security schemes which are based on occupational activity should aim at:

(a) if appropriate, progressively reducing threshold requirements based on earnings or hours of work as a condition for coverage by these schemes;

(b) applying minimum and flat-rate benefits as appropriate to part-time workers, in particular old-age benefits, invalidity benefits, maternity benefits and family allowances;

(c) accepting in principle that part-time workers whose employment has come to an end or been suspended and who are seeking only part-time employment meet the condition of availability for work required for the payment of unemployment benefits;

(d) reducing the risk that part-time workers may be penalized by schemes which:

   (i) subject the right to benefits to a qualifying period, expressed in terms of periods of contribution, of insurance or of employment during a given period of reference; or

(ii) fix the amount of benefits by reference both to an average of former earnings and to the length of the periods of contribution, of insurance or of employment.

21. (1) Threshold requirements for access to coverage under private occupational schemes which supplement or replace the statutory social security schemes should be progressively reduced to allow part-time workers to be covered as widely as possible.

(2) Part-time workers should be protected by such schemes under conditions equivalent to those of comparable full-time workers. Where appropriate, these conditions may be determined in proportion to hours of work or contributions.

22. (1) As appropriate, the threshold requirements based on earnings or hours of work as a condition for coverage by the protective laws and regulations in the fields referred to in Point 12 above should be progressively reduced.

(2) The periods of service required as a condition for protection in the fields covered by Point 12 above should not be longer for part-time workers than for comparable full-time workers.

23. Part-time workers should benefit on an equitable basis from financial compensation, additional to basic wages, which is received by comparable full-time workers.

24. All appropriate measures should be taken to ensure that as far as practicable part-time workers have access on an equitable basis to the welfare facilities and social services of the establishment concerned.

25. (1) The number and scheduling of hours of work of part-time workers should be established taking into account the interests of the workers as well as the needs of the establishment.

(2) As far as possible, changes in the agreed work schedule and work beyond scheduled hours should be subject to restrictions and to prior notice.

(3) The system of compensation for work beyond the agreed work schedule should be negotiated between the employer and the workers or their representatives, in accordance with national law and practice.

26. In accordance with national law and practice, part-time workers should have access on an equitable basis to all forms of leave available to comparable full-time workers, in particular paid educational leave, parental leave and leave in cases of illness of a child or another member of the worker's immediate family.

27. Where appropriate, the same rules should apply to part-time workers as to comparable full-time workers with respect to scheduling of annual leave and work on customary rest days and public holidays.

28. Where practicable, appropriate measures should be taken to overcome specific constraints on the access of part-time workers to training, career opportunities and occupational mobility.

29. Provisions of statutory social security schemes based on occupational activity that may discourage recourse to or acceptance of part-time work should be adapted, in particular those which:

(a) result in proportionately higher contributions for part-time workers;

(b) excessively reduce the unemployment insurance benefits of unemployed workers who temporarily accept part-time work;

(c) overemphasize, in the calculation of old-age benefits, the reduced income from part-time work undertaken solely during the period preceding retirement.

30. Measures should be considered by employers to facilitate access to part-time work at all levels of the enterprise, including skilled and managerial positions where appropriate.

31. (1) Where appropriate, consideration should be given by employers to:

(a) requests by workers for transfer from full-time to part-time work that becomes available with the same employer; and

(b) requests by workers for transfer from part-time to full-time work that becomes available with the same employer.

(2) Employers should provide timely information to the workers on the availability of part-time and full-time positions within the establishment concerned in order to facilitate transfers from full-time to part-time work and vice versa.

32. Without prejudice to the possibility of dismissal for economic, organizational or technical reasons, refusal to transfer from full-time to part-time work should not in itself constitute grounds for dismissal.

33. Where national or establishment-level conditions permit, workers should be given the right to transfer to part-time work and subsequently to return to full-time work in justified cases, such as pregnancy or the need to care for a young child or a disabled or sick dependant.

34. Where obligations on employers depend on the number of their employees, part-time workers may be given less weight than full-time workers, unless this would not be appropriate, for example for reasons of occupational safety and health.

35. Information should be disseminated on the protective measures that apply to part-time work, and on practical arrangements for various part-time work schemes.

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Part-time work"

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having adopted the report of the Committee appointed to consider the fifth item on the agenda,

Having in particular approved as general conclusions, with a view to the consultation of Governments, proposals for a Convention and a Recommendation concerning part-time work:

Decides that an item entitled "Part-time work" shall be included in the agenda of its next ordinary session for a second discussion regarding the proposed adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation concerning part-time work.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE PREVENTION OF MAJOR INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENTS: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – Our agenda starts with the adoption of the report of the Committee on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents. The report contains a summary of the Committee's discussions, a proposed Convention and a proposed Recommendation concerning the prevention of major industrial accidents, as well as a resolution concerning exposure to and safety in the use of biological agents at work.

I invite the officers of the Committee to come to the rostrum: the Chairman, Mr. Simanjuntak, Government member, Indonesia; the Employers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Campbell, Employers' member, United Kingdom; the Workers' Vice-Chairwoman, Ms. Mayman, Workers' member, Australia; and the Reporter, Mr. Seymour, Government member, United States.

I give the floor to Mr. Seymour, to submit the report.

Mr. SEYMOUR (Government member, United States; Reporter of the Committee on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents) – First, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the President on his unanimous election and able leadership as President of this important 80th Session of the Conference.

This morning I am pleased to submit to the International Labour Conference the report of the Committee on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents. The report, which can be found in Provisional Record No. 23, covers the proceedings of the meetings which, on the basis of a second discussion, have led to the proposed Convention, the proposed Recommendation and a Committee resolution on biological hazards.

Our Committee held 12 sittings and examined 103 amendments. Many of these amendments required long hours of deliberations, careful analysis and the establishment of several working groups, and had far-reaching effects on the final text. I must stress, however, that the discussion in the Committee clearly demonstrated a spirit of shared concern for the protection of workers, the public and the environment against the risk of major industrial accidents. As a result, the Committee was able to arrive at a consensus or an acceptable compromise on a vast majority of the issues. Voting was required on several occasions. Some of the most significant developments during the Committee proceedings this year included the transfer of a provision concerning lessons learned from "near misses" from the requirement under accident reporting to that on the arrangements at the level of installations; notifications to the competent authority before a permanent closure of a major hazard installation; and the right of the competent authority to suspend any operation that poses an imminent threat of a major accident. Another modification relates to the provision of information where transboundary effects are of concern.

Our task in the Committee was facilitated by previous ILO action, including the Conventions and Recommendations listed in the Preamble to the proposed Convention, and the Code of Practice on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents. The Committee also had the use of Reports IV(2A) and IV (2B) prepared by the Office subsequent to our first discussion in June 1992.

The first section of the proposed Convention – "Scope and definitions" – refers to the purpose of the instrument, states that it applies to major hazard installations and refers to the need for exclusion from its application of nuclear installations other than those systems which do not contain radioactive materials, military installations and transport outside the site of installations other than by pipeline, and the need for allowing progressive implementation. The definitions of the terms "hazardous substance", "major accident" and "near miss" have been improved.

The second section, entitled "General principles", calls for the formulation, implementation and periodic review of a coherent national policy for the protection of workers, the public and the environment against the risk of major hazard installations.

There is also a section entitled "Responsibilities of employers", which addresses the identification of major hazard installations, the notification to competent authorities of such installations, arrangements at the level of the installation, the development of on-site emergency plans, major accident reporting, and the preparation and updating of a safety report.

The section entitled "Responsibilities of competent authorities" covers the preparation of emergency plans outside the major hazard installation site, the siting of major hazard installations, the inspection of such installations, as well as the importance of the competent authority having a qualified staff. The instrument concludes with two sections on the "Rights and duties of workers and their representatives", and the "Responsibility of exporting States".

The proposed Recommendation provides guidance on how to transpose the principles of the Convention into a suitable legislation. As a result, the Recommendation contains more detailed provisions which could be included in such national legislation. More specifically, the proposed Recommendation provides that the ILO, in cooperation with other relevant international, intergovernmental, and non-governmental organizations, should arrange for an international exchange of information on good safety practices, major accidents, lessons learned from near misses, and effective procedures used by competent authorities. It also provides that the implementation of the provisions of the Convention should, as appropriate, be guided by the ILO Code of practice on the Prevention of major industrial accidents, published in 1991.

The Recommendation also provides guidance for the development of national policies on addressing hazards and risks of industrial sectors excluded from the scope of the Convention. There is a further provision which calls upon member States to encourage the establishment of systems to compensate workers of a major accident as quickly as possible after the event and address the effects on the public and the environment.

There is also a provision calling on national and multinational enterprises to provide safety measures relating to the prevention of major accidents in all of their establishments, regardless of where they are located.

A resolution has been prepared by the Committee, as the members noted the urgent need to address the issue of the exposure to and the safety in the use of biological agents at work. The proposed instruments address the prevention of major accidents involving one or more hazardous substances, and the Committee noted the special nature of biological agents, which may require safeguards not appropriate to the provisions of the Convention and Recommendation deliberated last year and this year. The resolution thus invites the Governing Body to request the Director-General to take steps to address the question of biological risks at work and to consider the need for new international instruments in order to minimize these risks.

I am pleased to say that our deliberations and activities were greatly facilitated by the able guidance and good humour of our Chairman, Dr. Simanjuntak; thanks to him and to the tripartite approach that prevailed, the final text of the proposed Convention and Recommendation, as well as that of the resolution were adopted in a remarkable spirit of cooperation.

Our equally able Vice-Chairpersons, Mr. Campbell for the Employers' group, and Ms. Mayman for the Workers' group, in addition to being professionals, shared a strong sense of concern and responsibility for the goals and objectives of the Committee's work. They also demonstrated creativity in the development of solutions to key issues. The delegates, who considered 103 amendments and the development of this Report, are commended for their excellent work.

I would like to acknowledge the work of those who served on the Drafting Committee. All have earned a well-deserved word of thanks, and should be well pleased with the excellent documents they provided the Committee for adoption.

In concluding my remarks on the report, I would like to express the gratitude of our Committee members for the excellent help and assistance we received at all times from the representative of the Secretary-General, Dr. Kogi, and his team of experts, secretaries, translators, clerks, typists and all others, who so ably carried out their tasks and were available at all times to respond to our wishes with good humour and efficiency. In my opinion, their hard work helped bring the activities of our Committee to a very successful adoption of a proposed Convention and Recommendation, as well as a resolution. We know that Dr. Kogi plans to retire this summer, and we would want him to know that he is greatly respected and appreciated by the Committee. We know that the ILO will miss his able service, but we wish him the very best in his future endeavours.

In summary, it gives me great pleasure to submit and recommend the adoption of the report of the Committee on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents, and the texts of the proposed Convention and Recommendation on this subject, and the resolution concerning the exposure to and safety in the use of biological agents at work, to the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Employers' member, United Kingdom; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents) – On behalf of the Employers' group of the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Accidents, I endorse the Committee's report.

The objective of the Convention is to prevent major accidents. The fundamental requirement is to establish a national policy and to have a systematic approach to put that policy into effective practice. This Convention sets out the duty to define and identify major hazard installations. It sets out the duties to assess the likelihood of harm to people and the environment from major hazard installations, and the matters that must be taken into account in making that assessment. It requires a report to be made which shares between employers, government competent authorities and workers the technical, organizational and other measures necessary to prevent major accidents and to mitigate their consequences. This Convention identifies the importance of planning in the relationship between local communities and major hazard installations, the importance of emergency plans both on and off site, and the importance of the competency of the staff of competent authorities. This Convention gives us a blinding flash of the obvious. Employers and workers must communicate freely and openly and must have a common goal in preventing major accidents, and must work as a team, always alert, always vigilant, always dedicated and always caring. This Convention is short and simple, focuses on major accidents, gives due regard to the differences in the levels and conditions of development in the various countries and, above all, is flexible in recognizing that equivalent protection is obtained by other national standards relevant to the prevention of major accidents.

The vital element of this Convention is that it is built on trust. Trust that competent authorities will reserve their powers: power to suspend any operation which poses an imminent threat of a major accident must be reserved within competency and only exercised through properly qualified and trained staff able to recognize and justify to others where imminent threat of a major accident exists. Trust that the competent authorities will recognize and avoid the potential bureaucratic web which could enmesh and strangle the operation of pipelines, one of the safest means of transporting certain hazardous substances. Trust that employers will build strong cooperative mechanisms to consult with workers and their representatives and that in return workers and their representatives will exercise their right with mature responsibility.

Building the key elements of successful major accidents- prevention policy, organizing, planning and measuring performance, all require a positive culture which secures involvement, participation and trust at all levels. This cannot be achieved overnight. This Convention is an invaluable step in the process and I commend our Convention to you to approve.

The proposed Convention is supported by a Recommendation. A Recommendation is an important instrument. Article 19, paragraph 6, of your Constitution says it is an important instrument, and yet in tripartite discussion I have heard workers being supported by Government delegates after suggesting that Recommendations be ignored with impunity. I have heard the Recommendation become, no longer an instrument of worth, but a receptacle for expressions of emotional humanitarian guilt, a receptacle for lists of good works, a receptacle for tired or frustrated committees to reproduce matters already discarded and none of them relevant to the Convention. Fortunately our Recommendation includes reference to the guiding light of the ILO Code of practice on the Prevention of major industrial accidents, 1991, and although this light is diminished by its companion references, references which I was led to believe by my tripartite colleagues have no legal status and may be ignored or discarded, it is the only light which gives strength to the Convention and by which I can recommend you to approve our Recommendation supporting this Convention. In doing so I recommend you, delegates of the ILO, to guard your Recommendations. Do not let them become worthless instruments which detract and decoy and confuse and in so doing diminish the strength of the Convention, leading to non-ratification

The proposed Convention and Recommendation are accompanied by a resolution. This resolution is made with regard to biological organisms. The resolution expresses the individual and collective fear of the technical Committee, a fear of the unknown, a fear fed on ignorance. The resolution suggests the ILO should set out to dispel this fear by seeking expert guidance to identify and consider the hazard. Only when that has been done can the need for further action be determined.

As a technical adviser, fleetingly thrust into the honour of Vice-Chairman of this technical Committee as part of this distinguished Organization, I offer the following comments which may contribute to the process of continuous improvement to which the ILO must subscribe if it is to survive.

In the welter of congratulations to the ILO staff and Organization for the success of this Conference, I have heard not much thought for the input and contribution of the many delegates and technical advisers who contribute the real input into this Conference, at a manhour cost I do not see reflected in the budget, and who pay an attention to costs and overheads and waste I do not always see reflected here at the ILO. The Conference could produce nothing of value without these people.

In my experience the rank-and-file of employees at all levels of work in the industry I was brought up in do not know what the ILO stands for, what achievements it has made, what it has done for them. The people I tell about the ILO are critical about our Government supporting an Organization about which they know nothing and yet provide for by their taxes. The ILO must consider what programmes of cooperation will produce the much needed workplaces of tomorrow, where their achievements can be talked about. These programmes need to be openly discussed as ILO programmes before a wider audience of people. It is argued to me that the ILO only advises and affects the life of employees through national governments and so it does not need to market itself. I am reminded of the story of the schoolgirl who was asked to write a résumé of the life of Socrates. She wrote "Socrates was a philosopher; Socrates advised the people; the people killed Socrates".

In conclusion, I have to say that this proposed Convention on the prevention of major accidents needs to be adopted so that the standards can be applied worldwide. Technically, it represents what much of the industry does or is required to do already. Do not vote against it tomorrow.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – I should like to express my appreciation to all the members of the Committee for their extremely important efforts.

Ms. MAYMAN (Workers' member, Australia; Vice-Chairwoman of the Committee on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents) – At the conclusion of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference in 1992, a report was adopted, providing a comprehensive and coherent basis for discussion on the prevention of major industrial accidents at the 80th Session this year. The aims of that document remain unchanged and firm. The primary aim of the document is to prevent major industrial accidents on a basis which is worldwide. Its secondary aims are to minimize the risks associated with major industrial accidents and to minimize the impact on workers, the public and the environment of such events. On behalf of the Workers, I am very pleased to be here this morning reporting on the consideration of a proposed Convention and Recommendation.

The Workers' Vice-Chairman in 1992 – and we pay tribute to Peter Aro – stated in his address to the 79th Session that there were three matters that needed to be addressed in 1993. Those three issues were important to Workers and they were, firstly, to delete the exemption clauses from the document as it existed then so that there were no industries exempted from a policy that would prevent major industrial accidents. The second concern of the Workers was to insert in the Convention the "polluter pays" principle, and their third concern was to address the question of biological hazards.

In relation to the discussion and the proposed Convention and Recommendation that are before this session, we have a document which now inserts in the Recommendation a request to the governments of member States to consider, by way of guidelines, implementing the principles of the Convention in those areas which are currently excluded. In relation to biological hazards, we have before us a resolution which seeks to address, in future ILO discussions, the question of exposure associated with working alongside biological hazards. In relation to the "polluter pays" principle and the question of compensating those workers who are affected by major industrial accidents, we have a Recommendation which once again offers guidance to the proposed Convention before us.

I wish to pay tribute on behalf of the Workers to the role played by developing countries in this 1993 session. It was those countries' role that preserved the responsibility of exporting member States to make available information on prohibited substances or processes being imported by member States. That was a crucial role and the Workers thank those developing countries, in particular Government representatives from those countries, for playing it.

A link was clearly established in 1992 between workers, the public and the environment in relation to prevention. That was a link recognized in the Director-General's Report in 1990 on the Environment and the world of work. That link was further extended in the 1993 discussions and is crucial to the ongoing work of the ILO, particularly as it relates to the prevention of major industrial accidents.

I might express a view on behalf of the Workers that the overall document is constructive and practical. It addresses the interests of industry and in particular the human resources within those industries. It addresses, in terms of the Recommendation, the documents that can be used by member States, Employers and Workers, that is to say the Code of Practice, to ensure that the proposed Convention submitted to this body for adoption is ratified in an appropriate manner by member States.

We also pay tribute – that is the Workers – to the meeting, which we believe was held in an atmosphere of tripartite consensus.

I thank Dr. Simanjuntak for his work of the Reporter, Mr. Seymour, and the secretariat. My special thanks also to those who have been active in the Workers' group in their various countries, either within those countries, or at this year's or last year's Conference. I want to thank the participants from all developing countries who have made this a truly and genuinely global exercise. And, on behalf of the Workers from all member States present today, I make a positive appeal to this Conference to adopt resoundingly this Convention and Recommendation tomorrow and encourage member States to engage in the ratification process, ensuring that there are no further major industrial accidents in our world.

Mr. SIMANJUNTAK (Government member, Indonesia; Chairman of the Committee on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents) – I too should like first of all to congratulate the President and the three Vice-Presidents on their election to chair this important session of the Conference.

As Chairman of the Committee on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents and on behalf of all its members, I should like to express our appreciation to the International Labour Conference for having placed for the second time the discussion of the prevention of major industrial accidents on the Conference agenda.

The importance of discussing this item has been reaffirmed by the unfortunate occurrence of major industrial accidents which continue to make headlines the world over. The key role of the ILO in strengthening the efforts of member States to prevent of such tragedies is therefore clear. The ILO has intensified its efforts in the field of the prevention and control of major industrial accidents, especially since the terrible industrial disaster which occurred in 1984 in Bhopal.

In this regard I recall the resolution adopted by the 1985 International Labour Conference concerning the promotion of measures against risks and accidents arising out of the use of dangerous substances and processes in industry. In response to that resolution, the ILO has embarked on a series of initiatives to promote programmes for the prevention of industrial disasters, including the development of a Code of Practice on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents and a training manual on major hazard control, as well as technical cooperation activities with several member States to help establish national major hazard control systems.

I believe that many member States of the ILO have also taken note both of the complexity of the task of preventing industrial disasters and of the usefulness of a unified approach embodying both national and international experience. But despite this growing awareness, several major industrial accidents involving chemical substances have occurred during the last few years both in industrialized and industrially developing countries. There is now an urgent need to establish national systems for the prevention of major industrial accidents in all member States where there is a potential for such accidents.

In the last two weeks, the Committee has discussed in detail the conclusions reached by the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters at the 79th Session in 1992. In the course of its discussions, the Committee members presented and discussed additional forceful arguments on matters of real substance. As a group consisting of learned experts from different environments, backgrounds and cultures, we were able this year to achieve our goals within the framework of tripartism and in a spirit of cooperation, goodwill and consultation. I am happy to report to the Conference that the Committee has adopted the proposed Convention and Recommendation on the subject as well as a resolution concerning exposure to, and the safe use of, biological agents at work. These two instruments constitute a landmark in the history of the prevention of major industrial accidents and are unique in placing special emphasis on the necessary organizational measures and on working arrangements at national level.

It should also be noted that these instruments have been structured so as to provide the much needed flexibility that would enable member States who ratify them to apply the appropriate practical measures in accordance with national laws and practices. They are therefore strongly recommended for adoption by the Conference and for their eventual speedy ratification by member States.

My task as Chairman of the Committee would have been impossible to accomplish without the support and cooperation I have enjoyed from all the officers and members of the Committee. My particular thanks go to the Government members, both as individuals and groups, for their skill in making their vast professional knowledge of the subject available to the Committee. Particular thanks also go to the Vice-Chairpersons and to the Employers' and Workers' members of the Committee. The Employers' member Vice-Chairpersons Mr. Campbell was able to use his expertise and that of his members to the benefit of the Committee.

Similarly, the ever resourceful Workers' member Vice-Chairperson Ms. Mayman made many significant contributions to the work of the Committee, by effectively making available the expert knowledge of her group. On several occasions, working parties were formed to assist the groups in their discussions of the Committee's work. I would also like to thank all the members of the working parties for their unstinting efforts to reach consensus on matters of common concern to the three groups of the Committee, and to express my appreciation to our Reporter Mr. T. Seymour and to the members of the Committee Drafting Committee for their hard work. He spared no effort in applying his expert knowledge to produce an accurate record of our work. This speech would be incomplete without paying a special tribute to the Conference's Secretary-General and his representative Dr. Kogi, who has merited our appreciation in the last term of his service in this Office. I should also thank Dr. Kogi's team of experts, secretaries, translators and clerks, as well as the other staff who assisted them. They represent the moving spirit behind whatever may have been achieved since the ILO started a series of initiatives after the Bhopal disaster.

In conclusion I would like to call on the Conference to endorse the Report and the proposed Convention and Recommendation, and to give its full support to the proposed resolutions as part of its continuing effort to prevent industrial accidents and mitigate their consequences worldwide. Thank you.

Mr. HOODA (Labour Minister, State Government of Haryana, India) – May I join the earlier speakers in extending to the President my warm felicitations on his election. Under his able guidance the proceedings of this Conference are being carried out smoothly. I also extend my congratulations to the Vice-Presidents and take this opportunity to extend my felicitations to Mr. Michel Hansenne on his unanimous re-election as Director-General.

I am sure the delegates will agree that the selection of agenda items for discussion during this session of the Conference is very appropriate and significant in the present international context. Matters relating to the application of ILO Conventions, technical cooperation between member States and the Director-General's Report on social insurance and social protection are very vital and have received the attention they richly deserve in the various committees of the Conference.

The proposed Convention on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents is a very important matter under consideration before the Conference. This subject directly affects all nations which have embarked upon industrialization as a means of securing economic growth and improving the quality of life of their peoples. It is of particular relevance to us in India in the light of the unique and tragic experience of the Bhopal disaster and its after-effects. I am sure that the delegates will agree with me that a major industrial disaster of the type which we encountered in Bhopal affects not only the workers but the community at large, and that the consequential disruptions extend far beyond the boundaries of industrial or occupational safety. The environment itself is a potential – and many times actual – victim in the case of major industrial accidents. The most dedicated and efficient relief and rehabilitation measures adopted after the accident cannot ever mitigate the various types of losses suffered in their entirety.

What is needed in the present context is an ingrained culture of industrial safety consciousness at all levels, at all times. The consciousness of safety has to be at the shop-floor level, in management practices, and in the administrative and legislative support systems. Thus, it may be appreciated that achievement of this paramount objective of avoidance of industrial accidents through the active and continued participation of all three social partners, namely the workers, the employers and the government, is essential to ensure a reasonable level of safety, not only immediately at the workplace, but also in the overall environment.

While adequate training in safety measures for the workers is vital, it is equally important to ensure management practices which place the very highest priority on systemic avoidance of major industrial accidents. This avoidance is possible through the adoption of processes which minimize the risk of failure of preventive mechanisms.

It is possible to build a safe environment at the workplace through a system of rigorous training, retraining, inspections, reporting and feedback, followed up by continuous and alert monitoring of all safety systems. To consolidate this environment, however, it is essential that appropriately updated information be readily available on all aspects of potentially hazardous events and locations. Also, this information must be available to all those who are concerned in the prevention of accidents. In the absence of such freely available, timely and accurate information, preventive systems run the risk of becoming static and incapable of dealing with the situation should an accident take place. It is in this context that India has stressed the need for each member State to formulate and implement a non-discriminatory policy on safety for both imported and exported hazardous substances, and to freely share information relating to the hazardous substances with their counterparts. This should include information on the nature and reasons for the prohibition of hazardous substances that are being exported.

My delegation welcomes and supports the report of the Committee on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents, which has taken into consideration all relevant aspects of the subject. A Convention on the subject will, in addition to highlighting the emphasis that the ILO places on this matter, serve as a framework for streamlining preventive measures by the member States. It will further act as a guide to individual States in modifying suitably their policies to ensure that they do not have to face the consequences of a major accident.

I conclude by expressing the hope that the important decisions arrived at in this Conference are acted upon by the member States in an expeditious and effective manner.

Mr. SCHALLER (Employers' adviser, United States) – The tripartite Committee on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents has, over the past two sessions of the Conference, sought to produce a practical instrument based upon proven principles and practices. Where the Committee adhered to these principles and practices, the proposed Convention and Recommendation we are to vote on tomorrow provide a sound basis upon which a member State can build an effective programme.

Unfortunately, however, some operational provisions of the proposed Convention, as well as the content of the proposed Recommendation, may prevent ratification by some member States. A major issue is the inclusion, as Article 19, of a provision which gives the competent authority the power to suspend any operation which in his judgement poses an imminent threat of a major accident. No provision is made for judicial protection against arbitrary or ill-advised exercise of this power as is provided in United States law.

The United States Employers' delegation believes this proposed Convention could provide valuable guidance and incentives to the member States which can ratify it. We hope that many can. But because of Article 19, we doubt that it could be ratified by the United States. Therefore, the United States Employers' delegation will abstain in tomorrow's vote.

Original French: Mr. ELMIGER (Government delegate, Switzerland) – I have the honour of representing the Swiss Government delegation and I would like to make a few comments before this august assembly in connection with the report and the proposed instruments before us today.

I would first of all like to say that the Government delegation of Switzerland accepts the report and the spirit and the contents in general of the proposed instruments.

The Government delegation of Switzerland would like to express its congratulations to the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen and all the members of the Committee for the quality of the work undertaken and brought to such a successful conclusion. However, the Government delegation of Switzerland would like to make a reservation in connection with what is to be found in paragraph 46 of the report. This is the concept of consultation of the workers or their representatives. This concept poses problems under Swiss law which at this stage has not yet incorporated this concept of representation of workers within the framework of consultations. Of course the social partners may within the framework of collective agreements agree on such a process but as long as our legislation has a gap in this respect we will have difficulties in accepting provisions of an international instrument which refer to the principle of consultation of the workers. That is why I would like to repeat here that our reservation extends to all the provisions of the two instruments which are before us and which refer to the concept of consultation of the workers. I would immediately like to say that this reservation does not prejudge in any way the vote of the Government delegation tomorrow during the adoption of the proposed instruments.

Finally, I would like to make a brief comment concerning the problem of the responsibility of exporting States as set out in the last Article of the proposed Convention. This could lead to difficulties for the Government delegation of Switzerland, as was already the case with other international instruments adopted in recent years in this Organization. Why? It so happens that this problem of the responsibility of exporting States does not concern the relevant provisions under labour law for the protection of workers, but is rather a question of exports and commercial policy. That is why, without prejudging matters in any way, I also wish to make a formal reservation by my delegation on this point.

As regards these two reservations, it is clear that the Swiss delegation will carry out all the necessary detailed analyses in the light of its legislation, policies and existing practices so as to ascertain whether, when the time is right, a ratification of the proposed instruments might be envisaged.

Ms. ADLER (Government delegate, Denmark) – On behalf of the Government members of the member States of the European Community, I would like first to express our hope that the proposed Convention and Recommendation concerning the prevention of major industrial accidents will be adopted.

We believe that the prevention of major industrial accidents is a very important issue for the protection of health and safety of workers, the public and the environment. The ILO with its tripartite structure is the appropriate forum in which to work towards achieving the goals of the proposed instruments that will now have a worldwide scope.

It is for these reasons that the member States of the European Community have participated constructively and will vote in favour of adoption. We sincerely hope that the impact of the work carried out here at Geneva will help to prevent major industrial accidents in the future and in drawing up related strategies.

I would like to stress further that mutual assistance, cooperation and the exchange of information is absolutely essential to achieve the goals of these proposed instruments. Such work already takes place bilaterally as well as multilaterally. For example, we could mention the work done within the framework of the United Nations ECE Convention on transboundary effects of industrial accidents. Based on the experience we have gained from the adoption of similar regulations at Community level, the European Community may provide assistance to ILO member States with regard to the implementation of these proposed instruments.

In closing, I would like to join those who have already thanked the Officers of Conference and all the members of the Committee who have participated in the preparatory work. In particular, I would like to congratulate the Chairman of the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Accidents, Mr. Simanjuntak, for ensuring balanced debates, the two Vice-Chairpersons: Mr. Campbell and Ms. Mayman for their contributions, as well as the ILO Secretariat for its assistance.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We move on now to the adoption of the report, paragraphs 1 to 150. Can I take it that the report is adopted, with the reservations expressed by the Government delegates of the United States and of Switzerland?

(The report is adopted, paragraphs 1 to 150.)

PROPOSED CONVENTION CONCERNING THE PREVENTION OF MAJOR INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENTS: ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We move on now to the adoption of the proposed Convention concerning the prevention of major industrial accidents. I submit the Preamble for your approval. If there are no objections I shall consider it adopted.

(The Preamble is adopted.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We shall now adopt the proposed Convention, Article by Article.

(Articles 1 to 22 are adopted seriatim.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We shall now adopt the proposed Convention as a whole. If there are no objections, I shall consider it adopted.

(The proposed Convention is adopted as a whole.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – In accordance with article 40, paragraph 7, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the proposed Convention concerning the prevention of major industrial accidents as adopted by the Conference, will be submitted to the Drafting Committee of the Conference for the preparation of the final text.

PROPOSED RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING THE PREVENTION OF MAJOR INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENTS: ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the adoption of the proposed Recommendation concerning the prevention of major industrial accidents, starting with the Preamble. If there are no objections I shall consider it adopted.

(The Preamble is adopted.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We shall now adopt the proposed Recommendation, Paragraph by Paragraph.

(Paragraphs 1 to 6 are adopted seriatim.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We shall now consider the proposed Recommendation as a whole. If there are no objections, I shall consider it adopted.

(The proposed Recommendation is adopted as a whole.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – In accordance with article 40, paragraph 7, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the proposed Recommendation concerning the prevention of major industrial accidents as adopted by the Conference, will be submitted to the Drafting Committee of the Conference for the preparation of the final text.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING EXPOSURE TO AND SAFETY IN THE USE OF BIOLOGICAL AGENTS AT WORK, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON THE PREVENTION OF MAJOR INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENTS: ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We shall now move on to the adoption of the resolution concerning exposure to and safety in the use of biological agents at work. If there are no objections, I shall consider this resolution adopted, taking into account the reservations expressed.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We have now completed the consideration of the report, the proposed Convention and Recommendation, and the resolution submitted by the Committee on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents. I express my gratitude to the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen, the Reporter, the members of the Committee and the staff of the Secretariat for the excellent work they have done, with special thanks to the experts. I would like to assure Mr. Campbell, the Employer Vice-Chairman, that we will not do to him what the people did to Socrates. I thank the Secretariat for the excellent work they have done.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE APPLICATION OF STANDARDS: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We shall move on to the second item on our agenda – the report of the Committee on Application of Standards, contained in Provisional Record No. 25.

It is my pleasure to ask the officers of the Committee to come to the rostrum. The Chairman, Mr. Pérez del Castillo, Government member, Uruguay; the Employer Vice-Chairman, Mr. Wisskirchen, Employers' member, Germany; the Worker Vice-Chairman, Mr. Peirens, Workers' member, Belgium; and the Reporter, Ms. Wiklund, Government member, Sweden.

I give the floor to Ms. Wiklund to submit the report.

Ms. WIKLUND (Government member, Sweden; Reporter of the Committee on the Application of Standards) – It is an honour for me to present to this session of the Conference the Report of the Committee on the Application of Standards which appears as Provisional Record No. 25.

The Committee was set up under article 7 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference to consider and report on item III on its agenda, "Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations".

The Committee based its work on the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. As usual, the Committee divided its work into different parts, as is reflected in the Report. Part One began with a general discussion of various aspects of the application of international labour standards. It then discussed the General Survey of the Committee of Experts which this year dealt with the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention (No. 156) and Recommendation (No. 165), 1981. Lastly, it examined a number of individual cases relating to compliance by States with their obligations under or relating to international labour standards.

Numerous statements were made during the Committee's general discussion. In many of these statements, opinions were voiced concerning the roles of the supervisory bodies and the complementary mission of the Committee of Experts and the tripartite Conference Committee on the Application of Standards.

The Conference Committee again acknowledged the work done by the Committee of Experts based on the principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality and emphasized again the importance of dialogue between the two Committees.

This year's Conference Committee on the Application of Standards was rather special, in that it was the first time ever that the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations was represented. The Chairman of the Committee of Experts, Mr. José Maria Ruda, attended the general discussion and that of the general survey, in accordance with the wish expressed by the Conference Committee last year.

The Committee very much welcomed this development, as a mark of the intensification of constructive dialogue between the committees. Each one of these is an essential element in the ILO's supervisory machinery which according to Mr. Ruda and many others, is the most effective of its kind in any international organization.

The Committee expressed its warm appreciation of this direct contact between the two committees and hoped that the presence of the Chairman of the Committee of Experts will be ensured in the future as well.

The Committee was informed of the consideration being given within the Organization to ways in which the arrangements for requesting Government reports on ratified Conventions under article 22 of the Constitution might be improved. This followed the Committee's discussions in previous years of the difficulties encountered by some governments in fulfilling their reporting obligations.

There was general support for such efforts, although it was emphasized by many members of the Committee, and the Committee was reassured by the representative of the Secretary-General on this point – that any future reforms would in no case be allowed to weaken the quality and effectiveness of the supervisory system.

The Committee understood that a proposed balanced package of measures replacing certain automatic reporting procedures with more selective and objective ones could be foreseen. In this context the Committee wanted to underline the vital part played by employers' and workers' organizations at various stages of the supervisory system.

The question of the interpretation of Conventions was considered further by many speakers, in the light of an Office document submitted last month to the Governing Body, concerning the possibility under article 37(2) of the Constitution of the ILO of setting up a tribunal competent to give interpretations.

Diverse views were voiced in the debate. Some members expressed varying degree of support for a tribunal which, according to them, would speedily resolve disagreements regarding interpretations. Other members questioned the need for a tribunal given the existing supervisory system. The Committee agreed that the matter required further study.

The ILO's standard-setting policy was dealt with by several members. One innovation of particular interest to this Conference is the participation of a senior official of the International Labour Standards Department in the secretariat of technical committees of the Conference responsible for new instruments. This is seen as a means of improving the drafting of Conventions and Recommendations in the light of the Organization's experience with existing instruments.

Personally, I do welcome this cooperation between the technical and the standards departments. It is a fact that in technical committees which are given the difficult task to formulate international standards on specific subjects, for the majority of members, at least on the government benches, it is their first concrete contact with the ILO and with international standard setting.

With the assistance within the technical committees of experts from both technical departments and the International Labour Standards Department, the risk of confusion and ambiguities in the formulation and later application of standards can be reduced.

The Committee also draws to the attention of the Conference the different views expressed as to flexibility in ILO standards. Many members raised the importance of the principle of universality, both as regards the terms in which international labour standards are conceived and as regards the application in a continuously changing economic and social environment.

In this context, some members stressed the need to review and adapt standard setting and other activities in order to meet the new challenges. Others emphasized the link between economic development and transition, on the one hand, and the maintenance and improvement of social protection, which are the task of ILO standards, on the other.

The link between standards and development was on several occasions explicitly or implicitly referred to during our meetings.

There was, no doubt, widespread agreement in our Committee as to the role of the ILO's standard-setting activities in the fight against poverty and the realization of the objective of social justice which are the Organization's priorities.

Personally, I fully endorse this.

I do, however, think that we have to understand – and also to accept – that an issue as vast as that of poverty alleviation, in some quarters, can be approached from other angles. It is necessary also to consider the way in which we and they – mainly economists – look upon each other.

Perhaps because the mother tongue of our Chairman is Spanish, I have come to think of one of the most widely translated books in the world, namely Don Quijote by Cervantes. The subject-matter of that famous novel is idealism and realism.

Like Cervantes, I am convinced that we need them both – the Knight and his Squire. Therefore both sides participating in this debate should try to learn from each other – realizing that the means are always subordinate to the aims.

Two subjects – freedom of association and employment policy – held the Committee's special attention. The report shows the opinions of the members of the Committee as to the particular question of the interpretation of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and whether and how far that Convention protects the right to strike.

It was not for the Committee to come to any agreed conclusion on this point. The Committee noted that the General Survey of the Committee of Experts will next year be on the subject of freedom of association and Convention No. 87.

The other subject covered in this part of the report is the implementation of a policy of full, productive and freely chosen employment, under the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). Contrary to most Conventions, this is a policy instrument and it is my belief that such a Convention requires an approach and discussion which differ from other instruments.

The Convention cannot be regarded as a blueprint for economic or employment policies in an ever-changing world economy. This Convention mentions, and that is extremely important, a framework, some basic principles and ideas and also some fundamental procedures for economic and employment policy.

As you will find in the report, the discussion on this Convention, therefore and as usual, has its own specific characteristics.

As regards technical cooperation and standards, and the various forms of assistance given by the Office, the Committee heard with interest of the inclusion of standards specialists in 12 of the new multidisciplinary teams in the field. Several Government members spoke of the help they had received through the Office. The Committee noted the objective of the Office of increasing promotional activities as complementary to supervisory activities – and in no way detracting from them.

The Committee was very interested in the Committee of Experts' indications as to the ILO's relations with other international organizations, especially on human rights issues, and with special reference to the World Conference on Human Rights in Vienna. The Committee expressed clearly its view that the ILO should improve its image and play a more active role in the debate on labour and social issues in countries at all stages of development, including such areas as the protection of children.

The Committee devoted the second part of the general discussion to the overall study by the Committee of Experts which this year dealt with the application, by all member States, of the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, (No. 156), and Recommendation (No. 165), 1981. Those ILO standards have a dual objective. They aim at creating equal opportunity and treatment in working life between men and women with family responsibilities. And, in addition, they have the goal of promoting equality between workers with family responsibilities and those without such responsibilities.

It was apparent from the many statements made that, all over the world, women especially face difficulties of various kinds in combining gainful employment with family responsibilities. Women still shoulder all or most of the duties of caring for family members and maintaining the home, while men are the main breadwinners – full stop.

Moreover, it appeared from the discussion that women are still suffering considerable discrimination in the areas of vocational training and employment on account of their actual or anticipated family responsibilities. Indeed, a number of statements indicated that for women labour conditions had worsened in this respect as a result of the high and increasing levels of unemployment which often result from structural adjustment measures.

Though there was general support for the objectives of the standards in question, reservations were expressed by some as to the feasibility of meeting those objectives through the application of the standards. Certain members concluded that there was a case for revising the Convention in the hope that it would be reframed in terms that were more practicable, thereby increasing the possibility of a higher rate of ratification.

Generally, however, it can be said that the discussion concluded on an optimistic note. Many speakers commended the Committee of Experts for providing clarifications and explanations concerning the requirements of the instruments, which might encourage more countries to apply the instruments and to ratify Convention No. 156. For many speakers, the survey was an important contribution to the activities to be undertaken next year, which has been declared the "International Year of the Family" by the United Nations.

This was considered an opportune time for the ILO to disseminate information on the implementation of these instruments, concerning both shortcomings and successes, to the United Nations and the ILO's constituents. The aim is to promote equality worldwide and to inspire more States to ratify Convention No. 156.

The third and largest part of the work of the Committee consisted in examining, on the basis of observations made by the Committee of Experts, individual cases of respect for ILO standards. For the discussion of individual cases, the Committee continued to apply the working methods which it had previously followed.

As regards cases concerning the fulfilment of certain obligations, or so-called automatic cases, however, the Committee tried a new approach designed to increase the impact of the discussion and make better use of the time available.

These are the cases concerning compliance with the obligations under articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution to supply reports on ratified Conventions, in reply to comments made by the Committee of Experts; to supply reports on submission to the competent national authorities of instruments adopted by the Conference; and to supply reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations.

The new approach was simply to discuss all those cases in sequence at one sitting instead of examining them piecemeal during several different sittings. The results may be regarded as interesting, and the Committee hopes to continue next year to refine its approach to these cases in order to find the best possible means of improving its effectiveness in this respect.

The cases considered in this way are mentioned under the appropriate headings in section D of the report and, as usual, Part Two of the report gives full details of the information provided by governments to the Conference in response to the indications of the Committee of Experts and also gives details of the Committee's discussions of these cases.

Further, the Committee examined the application by 33 governments of their obligations under individual ratified Conventions.

It was pleasing to note that all the governments invited by the Chairman to participate in the Committee's discussions of their cases of this kind and present at the Conference responded to his invitation. Many of these cases concerned problems of the application of Conventions relating to freedom of association, forced labour or equal opportunity and treatment.

The Committee decided to draw the attention of the Conference to the case of Myanmar as regards the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87). Paragraph 125 of the report expresses the Committee's deep concern that the necessary measures should be taken to guarantee the application of the Convention.

The Committee also decided to note with grave concern in paragraph 127 that there had been continued failure over several years to eliminate serious discrepancies in the application by Sudan of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29).

In these two cases, the Committee invites the Governments concerned to supply the relevant reports and information so that the Committee may follow up the matters at the next session of the Conference.

Part Two of the report contains a record of the detailed discussions of the individual cases, as well as the conclusions adopted by the Committee.

I want to take this opportunity to thank the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Pérez del Castillo, as well as the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Wisskirchen and Mr. Peirens, for the competence and efficiency with which they made sure that the Committee could complete such a large volume of work and discharge the heavy responsibilities which the Conference placed on it. May I also through you thank Mr. Bartolomei de la Cruz for his valuable support and also all his staff for their dedicated work, whether they were seen in the meeting room or not.

As you can see, the Committee on the Application of Standards continues to perform its vital tasks in a spirit which recognizes both the strength of traditions and established procedures and the necessity to maintain a dynamic attitude in the constant search to ensure maximum effectiveness.

I am convinced that it is the idea of dialogue which lies behind both the strength and the dynamism, and it is in this confidence that I commend the report to the Conference.

(Mr. Gray takes the Chair.)

Original German: Mr. WISSKIRCHEN (Employers' member Germany; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Standards) – Our Committee has succeeded once again in presenting to the Conference a report that is not only comprehensive but very substantive. The Reporter has touched on and explained the essential points.

We noted in our Committee, like others, that the world is undergoing a very rapid and intensive process of change.

I could therefore place my contribution under the motto of change, for the challenges involved are ultimately challenges to the efficiency and credibility of this Organization, because the ILO is not exempt from these changes on the eve of the twenty-first century. On the contrary, it must make its own contribution to this change. The ILO must therefore review its goals and priorities in its respective areas of activity. The area of standard setting should be reviewed as well as those of the supervisory machinery, technical cooperation and advisory services and an organizational structure must be devised that is adequate to meet these new challenges. The IOE recently presented proposals for a basic reform of the ILO, which we emphatically endorse.

In the Committee on the Application of Standards, we have noted for a long time now that it appears essential to make amendments to our standard setting activities. We have been registering a significantly reduced rate of ratifications in connection with the more recent instruments over the past 15 years. At the same time, we see that member States are meeting the obligations which they have accepted in ratifying the instruments to an increasing less extent. The close connection between standard setting, ratification and practical application has been evident for many years. Standards which were too high, too complex, unclear or too detailed in content and aims will either not be ratified or will be ratified with the certainty that they will not be implemented in law and in practice. Such an attitude is prejudicial to the credibility and the prestige of member States as well as the ILO as a whole.

In this connection we must also develop greater sensitivity to noting when standards have become obsolete rather than reacting only when there is a series of denunciations of an instrument.

An appropriate adjustment to the new challenges requires greater use of the assistance, support and advisory services of the ILO must be strengthened. We consider these services of the ILO, from the standpoint of practical efficiency, to be as at least as valuable with regard to the application of standards as the supervisory machinery in the traditional sense.

The comments of the Committee in the general part of its report on the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), are in essence a very objective inventory of the problems in this respect. Meanwhile, there is general agreement that there can be no isolated employment policy which can create lasting jobs profitably. This requires the coordination of many areas of policy, not least of which is collective bargaining whereby the social partners can set the points towards an increase or decrease in jobs.

Some matters of principle concerning the supervision of standards and the supervisory machinery could be placed under the heading of "change" and dealt with in this context. Concerning the two most important supervisory bodies of the ILO, the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, there has been no doubt for at least two years that both bodies are autonomous and independent and do their work accordingly. Equally undeniable, according to the unambiguous statement of the Committee of Experts in its report of 1991, is the fact that the decisions of the one are not binding on the other, and that the respective evaluations do not prevail erga omnes. We think it is a very good sign of a new dialogue between these two autonomous bodies within the ILO supervisory system that the Chairman of the Committee of Experts accepted the invitation of our Committee and was present during the entire general discussion in our Committee as a very attentive observer. Mr. Ruda, the Chairman of the Committee of Experts, welcomed this new and intensive form of dialogue, a dialogue which in Mr. Ruda's words includes a review of previously held opinions.

Now that the more formal but essential issue of the autonomy and independence of the two bodies has been clarified, in future only the substance of the different views will be at issue. Such differences do not occur very often, but occasionally in connection with particularly important questions, in particular the interpretation methods to be applied in regard to Conventions and their concrete results. The only measuring rod for the interpretation of Conventions is, in our view, international customary law as well as international law in the written form set forth in Articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. This is also in principle recognized by the Committee of Experts. As we repeatedly stated in the Conference Committee, none of the interpretation methods that are relevant under international law allows for the "creation" of an extremely broad right to strike to be derived from Convention 87, such has been gradually developed by the Committee of Experts. Neither the text nor any discernable agreement between the signatory States or their subsequent conduct allow for such an interpretation. On the contrary, in the drafting of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, it was clear that issues of the right to strike were not to be dealt with. We have already referred to the corresponding documents. The historical facts confirm therefore merely what results from the first priority interpretation rule. The Employers, for example, already in 1953 expressed this view in the Governing Body when the Committee on Freedom of Association began to develop a right to strike.

We are not dealing here with a classical interpretation de lege artis. To that extent, a close connection may exist with the undeniable fact that the decision-making body of the ILO, that is to say the plenary of the Conference, has hitherto been deliberately prevented from dealing with this topic. A proposal from the Employers last year to place this problem on the agenda of the Conference was also rejected.

Implicitly, the right to strike developed by the Committee of Experts is virtually unlimited and the regulatory scope of the member States therefore tends to be non-existent.

The formulae developed by the Committee of Experts, which allow almost any type of strike and proscribe almost any restriction as being contrary to international law, cannot be justified on the basis of any interpretation instrument derived from Convention No. 87, because a strike is obviously not the internal affair of a trade union. It is directed primarily against employers but, given the scale of the division of labour in our time, its inevitable and calculated impact tends increasingly and ever more intensively to affect third parties and the general public. So-called "solidarity strikes" are intentionally directed first and foremost against people who are not actually involved in the conflict and political strikes are always designed to put pressure on lawmakers – hence, in a democracy – on parliament. No State can afford to accept such action without some form of regulation. On the contrary, it is the task of every State to make provision, in the area of labour conflict, for the protection of individual citizens and the population as a whole. The basic purpose of a State and its chief raison d'être is to provide the best possible protection for its citizens.

In recent years there has been a suggestion, not unrelated to these interpretation issues, that article 37, paragraph 2, of the ILO Constitution should be examined more closely. According to this provision, the Conference, at the suggestion of the Governing Body, can draw up rules for the establishment of a tribunal for the expeditious determination of any dispute or question relating to the interpretation of a Convention. The Office has prepared a document in this connection, dealing with various aspects of article 37, paragraph 2, of the Constitution and other issues of interpretation. Credit is due to the Office for its thorough and careful work. A whole series of findings are extremely enlightening. Some comments, however, are not so clear and call for further explanation and examination. In the Committee we also discussed certain points in greater depth and voiced a certain amount of criticism. Moreover, some issues which are not addressed at all by the document will have to be considered at some stage. To sum up, therefore, we would say for the time being that this important issue cannot be decided on the basis of the present document. Further careful study is necessary. Only when all further possibilities have been explored can we consider whether and how such a tribunal under article 37, paragraph 2, of the ILO Constitution might be established.

This year's General Survey under article 19 of the ILO Constitution is devoted to Convention No. 156 and Recommendation No. 165. This, too, is a topic oriented towards the future and towards change. The question at issue is the equality of workers, particularly those with and without family obligations. While nobody would underestimate the significance of this topic or fail to support the general objective, the measures needed to attain these goals cannot be limited to the typical employee-employer relationship, but have other far-reaching implications, partly of a general political and social nature. Full attainment of the goal in question would require an almost inconceivably large package of practical measures, in particular statutory regulations. Such an array of regulations would be bound to conflict with the basic principles of a free social order. The Convention therefore avoids this unnegotiable path but heads off in another direction that is no less fraught with problems. It establishes extraordinarily wide-ranging and comprehensive objectives, which are to be incorporated in any policy relating thereto. Together with further sub-goals, which are not always crystal clear, the whole experience creates an impression that family and occupational responsibilities can be combined without conflict provided that the State steps in with the necessary measures and regulations. As these ideas are thus conceived with an ideal situation in mind, they are bound to be unwieldy. The experts talk about flexibility but what we have before us is a considerable lack of clarity and vagueness. One gets the same impression from the way individual provisions of the Convention are dealt with in the experts' report. Member States have raised many questions about the meaning and interpretation of the individual provisions and the Committee of Experts has tried to give answers, which tend to reinterpret the obligations in very broad terms.

From the methodological point of view, it is extremely interesting to note that the Committee of Experts, in its attempts at interpretation, refers in practically all cases to the preparatory work, which therefore determines their interpretation. We find this aspect important in the light of the general discussion of the matter of deriving a right to strike from Convention No. 87.

Since the instruments before us do not prescribe specific and limited measures but only a goal to aim at, we are no longer dealing here with the flexible standards which are certainly also sought by employers; we are dealing rather with an overloaded instrument which describes an ideal goal. The Report of the Committee of Experts itself shows that we are not dealing with a flexible and easily applied Convention, because any measures taken by member States, whenever these are assessed by experts, are routinely described as inadequate and therefore criticized.

The member States have evidently recognized the problems inherent in these instruments, since only 19 ratifications have thus far been registered, and some of the States which have ratified the Convention will hardly be in a position fully to comply with its exacting requirements. One of the contracting States has not even submitted its first report. Although the employers have a natural interest in everyone being able to attain self-fulfilment through their occupation, we are sceptical that such a dream could be realized on the basis of standards alone. There are, after all, deeply rooted, traditional values which must be taken into account, and they can only be changed cautiously, and in small steps. This is what happens in practice in plants and factories. A uniform comprehensive model which takes account of different value systems and allows time for a gradual change in attitude is along way off.

In any case, we recommend that the report of the Committee of Experts be very carefully taken into account. Its analysis might finally lead to a review of Convention No. 156 with a view to making it more precise, practical and realistic.

The main object of the Committee is to examine the extent to which member States have met their obligations to the ILO. We are talking about varied reporting obligations and about material obligations of the ratifying States to implement Conventions which they have ratified. During the proceedings we have clearly differentiated between the so-called formal and material obligations. The purpose of concentrating our discussion of the report issues into one afternoon was to stress the significance of the issue, to bring together all the States concerned and to make better use of the limited time available to the Committee. This seems to have succeeded. It was not the purpose of the new procedure to absolve the member States concerned from the duty to reply.

Moreover, there has been a stagnation, or even decline, in the fulfilment of reporting obligation. This has caused much concern among the experts and on our Committee, since the fulfilment of reporting obligations is essential to any meaningful monitoring. Late or incomplete reports, or no reports at all, place the whole system in question and create an unacceptable degree of inequality in the treatment of different member States. Since, on the one hand, the absolute numbers of reports due and received reaches new record levels owing to the increase in membership, in ratifications and in Conventions, the Committee has long recognized the necessity of taking steps to clarify the situation. At the request of the Conference Committee, the Office has produced a document with many proposals which could improve the situation. We are grateful for these very meticulous deliberations. The approach outlined there is one which we can support, and we trust that the Governing Body will soon take the necessary decisions.

As we have already noted during the discussion in Committee, the only thing that must not happen is that nothing happens.

It is in the very nature of our review system that we deal mainly with cases in which there is a considerable discrepancy between statute and practice in a member State and the demands of a given Convention. Nevertheless, we do not forget that most member States faithfully fulfil their obligations under the Constitution and the ratified Conventions. The problematic cases and the relevant discussions in the Committee are described in detail in the comprehensive annex to the general part of our Report. We do not want to name particular cases here because that would seem somewhat arbitrary. May I, however, say that there do exist most serious violations of human rights, such as persecution for ethnic, religious and political reasons, and these occur on a mass scale and lead to many deaths. It is regrettable that we are not even in a position to deal with these very clear violations of basic Conventions. On the contrary, like many other organizations in the world, we seem to be helpless in the face of these terrible events.

But whatever the sweeping changes happening in our time, our high recognition for the President of our Committee, and for his prudent guidance of our discussion remains undiminished, as it does for our Reporter and for the Office's large team under the very careful guidance of Mr. Bartolomei. All have made vital contributions.

We also remain firm in our desire for objective cooperation with the Workers' group and their spokesman, Mr. Peirens. My special thanks go to the Employers' group on the Committee for their unswerving support especially this year, represented by Mr. Potter.

Original French: Mr. PEIRENS (Workers' member, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Standards) – The role of the ILO in connection with international labour standards and their supervisory machinery in this changing world was the leitmotif in many speeches during the general discussion in our Committee.

Several members in this context pleaded in favour of a revision and updating of the supervisory machinery and in particular of the constitutional obligation to send in reports. The Office is also preparing a document for the Governing Body for November 1993.

The Workers' group of our Committee is of the opinion that this is not a secondary aspect of a technical nature. On the contrary, the sending of reports together with the observations of the workers' and employers' organizations is indispensable for the operation of the supervisory machinery.

We would like to emphasize that it is necessary to be prudent and to ask the competent bodies of the ILO, that is the Governing Body, not to take hasty decisions which might, directly or indirectly, weaken the supervisory machinery and therefore the working of our Committee.

The Workers' group of our Committee proposes that the Governing Body, after a first discussion in November, should defer the question to next year so as to discuss it at the Conference and in particular in the Committee on the Application of Standards. Our Committee has, in fact, agreed to devote a special sitting at the next session of the Conference to the consideration of the future of the standard-setting machinery and the supervisory machinery, as can be found in paragraph 136 of our report. The Committee of Experts, in paragraph 12 of its report, has also indicated that it would put forward its views regarding the future of standards and the supervisory machinery of the ILO. The Governing Body could thus take a decision after the 81st Session of the Conference.

The Workers' group of the Committee feels that the proper working of the supervisory machinery is of capital importance. We are not against change on the condition that the future operation of the supervisory machinery is reinforced.

We would like to draw the attention of the Conference to the fact that the Employers' and Workers' groups have pleaded many times in favour of a reinforcement of the supervisory machinery and most of the Governments have quite clearly indicated their support of the standards and supervisory machinery.

Several Government members have declared that the supervisory machinery of the ILO is superior to that of other international or supranational organizations and that we should not be influenced by systems of an inferior quality.

We would therefore firmly like to ask for the maintenance of a very regular control of the application of Conventions in both law and practice. Within this framework we would like to insist that particular attention should be given to the Conventions which have been classified in the category of fundamental human rights and to certain Conventions in the priority category, such as Conventions Nos. 81, 122 and 144. This classification was formally decided on by the Governing Body in 1987 on the proposal of the Ventejol report.

We would like to draw the attention of all the delegates of the Conference to the conclusions of this Ventejol report regarding the classification of Conventions.

This report concludes that the Conventions regarding the fundamental human rights, such as the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), require no revision and that, furthermore, most of them have already been revised.

The intervention of the supervisory machinery cannot be restricted to clear and flagrant violations of fundamental human rights. These have often become very sophisticated and masked by complex legislation, in the industrialized countries also. That is why we attach great importance to the sending in of first reports after the ratification of a Convention and to the sending of questionnaires and detailed reports on a regular basis, in particular for the fundamental Conventions regarding freedom of association, free collective bargaining, prohibition of discrimination and forced labour.

The ILO could also extend the present system of the complaints procedure, before the Committee on Freedom of Association to other Conventions and fundamental principles, as for instance equality of treatment, as was suggested by the Committee of Experts last March.

Furthermore, we would like to ask the Office to send the report of the Committee of Experts earlier. This would facilitate the participation of workers in the developing countries.

As regards the possible setting up of a competent tribunal so as to resolve problems of interpretation for a given Convention in accordance with Article 37(2), the Workers' group is of the opinion that the setting up of such a tribunal could put into question the credibility and the authority of the Committee of Experts. To date, we are not convinced of the additional value of a tribunal as compared to the experts, to the dialogue of our Committee and the existing possibility of resorting to the International Court of Justice.

The extent of the right to strike was once again the subject of in-depth discussions, seeing as the Employers have some differences of opinion with the Committee of Experts.

We, as the Workers' group, firmly support the view of the Committee of Experts regarding the modalities of the right to strike.

The Committee of Experts has always based itself on the principles which have been developed and refined consensually by the tripartite Committee on Freedom of Association.

Even if the mandate of the Committee of Experts on the one hand and that of the Committee on Freedom of Association on the other are different, we really do not see how their respective interpretations could diverge. This would be illogical and inconsistent.

The legal value of the criticism of a group in our Committee, that is to say the Employers, as regards the position of the Committee of Experts should be put into perspective in view of the scope of the tasks of the two Committees. The Committee of Experts guarantees, through its composition and its methods of work, an objective assessment. Our tripartite Committee maintains and keeps alive the system, thanks to our knowledge of the situation in the field.

The position of the Employers, stating that the modalities of the right to strike as well as the scope of the concept of essential services should be governed by national law, is not compatible with the fundamental principle of universality of standards.

During the discussion of individual cases, we had a shocking case which illustrates very well the serious consequences of the non-respect of the universality of standards. This is the denial of trade union rights and the non-application of the labour code in the export processing zones in Pakistan (the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11). Our Committee as a whole has adopted very firm conclusions on this particular case and if, next year, our Committee does not find that there has been concrete progress, the case of Pakistan, in the opinion of the Workers' group, will have to be referred to in a special paragraph. The Government has furthermore formally accepted a technical assistance mission from the ILO.

As has already been mentioned by the Reporter, our Committee also dealt with the General Survey regarding workers with family responsibilities (Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156), and Recommendation No. 165).

The Workers' group is of the opinion that the objectives of these instruments are very topical and that countries should increase their efforts to make them more concrete.

The General Survey clarified the scope of the Convention and this clarification will undoubtedly facilitate its ratification. We encourage States to ratify. This Convention should not in our opinion be revised.

Our Committee has also adopted important conclusions on several serious cases. Even though no special paragraphs were included in the report, the conclusions imply very important commitments in very specific and concrete terms.

We are referring to the cases of Colombia (very serious violations of law and practice as regards Convention No. 87); Costa Rica (Convention No. 87, in relation to solidarity movements or company unions); Brazil, the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), including child labour, and the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107); and India, the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), with reference to servitude for debt by child labour.

We have also given great attention to the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). In two cases (the United Kingdom and New Zealand) we were able to see that employment is considered as an element or a variable which can be adjusted among many others. Such a policy is not in conformity with Convention No. 122 and we would like to suggest that you read paragraph 55 of the general part of the report of the Committee of Experts. In both cases the Government is not fully consulting workers' and employers' organizations for the implementation of employment policies (Article 3 of the Convention).

The case of Sweden (Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), has demonstrated that certain countries adopt socio-economic policies without an in-depth consultation of the employers' and workers' organizations who are the authors and signatories of collective agreements. These policies have direct and indirect effects on collective agreements and collective bargaining. This approach is contrary to the basic principle of Convention No. 98. Compliance with collective agreements and the outcome of negotiations is, in our opinion, a non-negotiable principle.

Our Committee was able, for the first time, to discuss a case involving the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). The United Kingdom has not respected Convention No. 144 because it failed extensively to consult the workers' and employers' organizations regarding the denunciation of certain Conventions and regarding the replies to the comments of the Committee of Experts.

The technical Conventions were also discussed. I am referring to the conclusion of the case of Morocco and the Benzene Convention (No. 136). Our Committee found that Morocco is not applying the essential provisions of this Convention, whose practical importance is more than simply a technical question. The health and even the life of the workers are involved. If there is no decisive progress in the very short term, we will come back to this case next year.

We have also dealt with questions of substance as to the organization and operation of social security in Chile (the Old-Age Insurance (Industry, etc.) Convention, 1933 (No. 35)). In this connection it is important to emphasize that the pension system in Chile is not only in violation of Convention No. 35, but its performance and credibility in the long run is also challenged by independent specialists. Furthermore, the system is not in conformity with the fundamental principles of the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), and the Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Benefits Convention, 1967 (No. 128). Chile has not yet ratified these two Conventions. The Committee firmly insisted that Chile should reconsider its position.

Because of a lack of time it was not possible for us to deal with a number of other cases. We hope that the report of the experts will make it possible for us to take them up next year if we feel the need to do so (for example, Conventions Nos. 87 and 111, as regards Germany, Convention No. 107 for Bangladesh, and Convention No. 87 for Canada).

As pointed out by our Reporter, we were obliged to single out Myanmar in a special paragraph of our report (paragraph 125), since the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee have pointed out for many years, in connection with Convention No. 87, that certain provisions of national legislation require modification, without success up to now.

The case of Sudan is reported in paragraph 127, and refers to the continued failure to eliminate deficiencies in the application of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29). I would like to remind you that last year we had to single out Sudan in a special paragraph because of the continued existence of forced labour and the lack of cooperation on the part of the Government with the ILO and our committee.

In conclusion, I too would like to thank our Chairman, Mr. Pérez del Castillo, who guided and chaired our discussions in a remarkable manner. I would also like to thank our Reporter Ms. Wiklund, the representative of the Director-General, Mr. Bartolomei de la Cruz, Mr. Zenger and Mr. Gernigon, as well as the whole team of the Office and the interpreters for their efforts and devotion. I would also like to thank the Employers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Wisskirchen, for his spirit of dialogue and constructive approach.

I would also like to thank the officers of the Workers' Group, particularly Mr. Hickey, who had to leave because of bad health, and everyone else who helped us.

Our Report was unanimously adopted by the Committee. I commend it to the Conference for adoption.

Original Spanish: Mr. PEREZ DEL CASTILLO (Government member, Uruguay; Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Standards) – I was not intending to speak, but I would like to take this unexpected opportunity to thank the members of the Committee on the Application of Standards for the work that we have done together.

I would particularly like to mention the cooperation, the serious and responsible work done and the spirit of teamwork shown by Mr. Bartolomie de la Cruz, Mr. Zenger and Mr. Gernigon, and at the same time, alongside them I would like to thank all those people who as our Reporter so rightly said were visible or not in the meeting room but who we felt were with us and that we could count on their work the behind-the-scenes activities of so many staff members of our Office, which make it possible for the activities of this Committee, which are particularly difficult demanding greater effort and more time, can be carried out and enable us to submit this report to you. This report which like anything produced by human hand has its good and bad points but is well intended and the result of the efforts we made to ensure that something as important as the Application of Standards, could be dealt with at this session of the Conference.

So thank you all once again. I hope that we will meet again next year so that we can go on striving towards our objectives and fulfilling our mandate of social justice as laid down in the Constitution.

Original Japanese: Mr. HIROMI (Government adviser and substitute delegate, Japan) – I would like to comment on the wording in Provisional Record No. 25, concerning the case involving Japan.

An amendment submitted by the Government of Japan is not reflected in the Committee's report; we request that the amendment submitted by the Japanese Government be included in the Record of the Conference.

When inviting the ILO to Japan in connection with Convention No. 87, the Chairman of the Committee said at the meeting, and I quote "... to visit Japan to discuss this question of the right to organize of the fire-fighting personnel in order to be able to see the situation for themselves on the spot, and discuss the matter with the persons directly concerned". However, in PV 13 of the Committee's minutes, this comment was summarized as "... [Japan] ...". Since we consider "to invite ... to come to Japan ... to obtain information directly" to be different from the conclusions of the Chairman of the Committee, we submitted our amendment. In the Committee, it was announced that this part was adopted as amended. However, the meeting ended before the specific wording of this amendment was presented. The version in the report of the Committee distributed today in Provisional Record No. 25 remains unamended, and therefore does not reflect the decision of the Committee.

I regret that this has happened in terms of procedure. This should have been dealt with at Committee level, but since this was not done due to the situation I have described, I would like to state that the Government of Japan insists that the wording of the Chairman of the Committee be the correct version, and asks that this statement be placed in the Record of the Conference.

Original German: Mr. ADAMY (Workers' adviser and substitute delegate, Germany) – The World Conference on Human Rights that is meeting in Vienna makes it clear that the instruments for the guarantee of human rights have to be further developed and strengthened. But within the context of our terms of reference, we also have to make sure that there are no reductions made in the universality and binding nature of the central standards respecting human rights. This is particularly valid as regards what I am sure is the most of important of all international labour Conventions, namely the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention 1948, (No. 87). And yet recently it was specifically against this instrument that the criticisms of the Employers were directed in the Committee on Application of Standards. This was very clear again this time. Quite obviously they want to make this central international standard conditional, and they are calling jurisprudence into question as regards the scope of the right to strike.

The criticisms by the German Employers' member in this Committee in particular concentrate on the points on which my country has also had problems in observing this Convention. It is therefore not surprising if the Government representative of my country in this Committee also tries to make conditional this human rights international labour Convention, and if he largely shares the position adopted by the Employers' group in this Committee. They have together been basing their criticisms recently on the fact that Convention No. 87 does not contain any express guarantee of the right to strike. However, this is not something which is true only for the ILO but is the case also with the Constitution of a number of member States. For instance, it is also the case with the Constitution of my country.

The supervisory machinery in the ILO, early on recognized, in a practice that goes back 40 years, that strikes are a central premise and a means of making it possible for workers and their trade unions to ensure that collective agreements be implemented and applied. In order to protect the activities of trade unions, you have to have the right to strike.

The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Committee on Freedom of Association have established a number of basic principles on freedom of association which in particular define the conditions and circumstances under which the right to strike can be banned or limited. It is not true that these Committees recognize a practically unlimited right to strike as has been suggested here by the representative of the Employers. On the contrary, they have tried to establish a proper balance between the opposing interests in play and at the same time avoid an unjustified restriction of the activities of trade unions.

The Committee on Freedom of Association in the meantime has developed a body of important rulings which shows, as does the work of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, that the Employers' group has for many years agreed with the basic principles of this freedom of association. However, since the end of the 1980s and the end of the Cold War, this consensus has been questioned more and more by the Employers in the Conference Committee.

However, the justifications that are given do not really stand up to analysis. The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties is referred to more and more in order to allow greater intervention by the State in the exercise of the right to strike, and greater influence over case law within the ILO. In fact, however, and here I decisively disagree with the Employers' spokesman, the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties is not applicable to international organizations like the ILO if they have their own rules of interpretation. There is no principle of general international law that standards adopted by international organizations must be interpreted according to the rules of the Vienna Convention. Article 5 of that Convention, for instance, says that its own rules do not take precedence over the corresponding interpretative rules of international organizations. The case law developed over decades in the ILO therefore takes precedence over the corresponding provisions of the Vienna Convention.

But even if one invokes the rules of the Vienna Convention, then according to Article 31, paragraph 3, it matters not whether all the contracting parties have explicitly agreed to the interpretation of the Convention concerned. On the contrary, silence can be taken as consent. According to article 31 of the Vienna Convention it is necessary to take into account "any subsequent practice in the application of the treaty which establishes the agreement of the parties regarding its interpretation".

For many years, there has been absolutely no contradiction by the Employers on the Conference Committee as regards the existing case law. On other supervisory bodies, like the Committee on Freedom of Association, they also support the principle of freedom of association and the practical way it is implemented.

Furthermore, the following facts also lead us to believe that the principles of freedom of association have become part of general international law. Firstly, in 1986 the United Nations Commission on Human Rights recognized as valid the interpretation by the ILO bodies of the right to strike. Secondly, the ILO Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association concerning the Republic of South Africa designated many principles of freedom of association as part of customary international law. And, thirdly, the Legal Adviser, in his statement on article 37, paragraph 2, of the ILO Constitution drew attention to the fact that the long-standing interpretation of the Committee on Experts – which has not been contradicted – could become binding.

This incontravertible principle of international law must be taken into account. It would also be wrong to accept the principle that an interpretation of ILO Conventions that is lenient on the States Parties must be chosen. This is something that can hardly be acceptable for international organizations and certainly not for Conventions on human rights. Otherwise the universality and the binding nature of human rights precepts would be called in question. The historical method of interpretation used by the Employers is also unconvincing. For example, the critical comments of the Employers shortly after the adoption of Convention No. 87 are today overinterpreted. Even at that time they could not be considered as a basic questioning of the right to strike. With regard to Convention No. 35, the Employers on this year's Committee relativized an historical interpretation themselves in the case of Chile. We very often have difficulties with historical interpretations because, as we all know, when standards are being established political compromises are frequently reached outside the committee room and therefore do not appear in any minutes or records. And this is something mentioned by the Legal Adviser in the opinions I have already referred to.

Above all, it should be borne in mind that the Vienna Convention – which is constantly being referred to by the Employers – views the historical method merely as a source of supplementary assistance. According to Article 32 of the Vienna Convention, this method can only have significance if the meaning of the rules for interpretation is ambiguous or obscure or leads to a result which is manifestly absurd or unreasonable. This certainly does not apply to the decision-making practice in the ILO supervisory bodies. Hence, even under the Vienna Convention there is no basis for a strong emphasis on historical interpretation.

We should neither directly nor indirectly question the methods and case law of the ILO supervisory machinery. We must ensure that the approach adopted in assessing the implementation of standards is not influenced by ideas originating in a specific social or economic system. The law applied in some industrialized countries cannot and should not therefore become a standard for the interpretation of Conventions.

After the collapse of the former socialist bloc, we must in no way give in to the temptation to misuse the supervisory system for one-sided political and economic purposes.

The Committee of Experts, because of the status, knowledge and independence of its members, deserves the greatest attention and respect. By contrast with the Committee of Experts, the Conference Committee consists not of independent experts but of representatives of the different parties affected by the implementation of the Conventions. However, this certainly does not mean that the comments by the Conference are expressions of views and considerations without moral and political value. On the other hand, we should not overstress the importance of the Conference Committee, since otherwise in the long term we would be running the risk that majority decisions, taken by that body which is politically constituted, could conflict with the principle of independent proceedings according to due process. It should not be forgotten that numerous difficulties were encountered when the Committee's Report was approved. We should therefore decide jointly to ensure that the conclusions of the Committee of Experts, and the supervisory and interpretation method used, are in no way watered down.

If we do not wish to endanger the credibility of this international organization, then we must speak out against any relativization of human rights in the world of work as elsewhere. This applies particularly to the Committee of Experts.

Fortunately, the Chairman of that Committee, Mr. Ruda, has once again emphasized in the Conference Committee that the experts were expressly guided by the principles of objectivity, impartiality and independence and in this we emphatically support the Committee.

As the spokesman of the Employers' group emphasizes, we are in no position, when it comes to violations of international standards, to guarantee a solution, and we should rather aim at extending our procedures rather than at reducing them, otherwise we will lose our credibility.

Mr. POTTER (Employers' adviser and substitute delegate, United States) – I had not intended to participate in this general discussion but because of the unfortunate attack on the representative of the Employers' group characterizing that representative as a German Employer, I want to make it clear that the points of view that Mr. Wisskirchen articulated are those of the entire Employers' group. The last few years have witnessed a substantial shift in world relations, particularly in the demise of the struggle between east and west. That earlier conflict involving diametrically opposed views cast a shadow on the work of our Conference Committee and the supervisory machinery generally. Disagreements that the Employers have always had with just a few interpretations by the Experts of the ILO Conventions, particularly concerning the right to strike, were muted in a show of solidarity to preserve the supervisory machinery. The support of the supervisory machinery was important then and still is. For the most part the Conference Committee follows the findings and interpretations of the Experts, but this does not mean that the Conference Committee is a rubber stamp for the Experts. While the report of the Experts is indispensable to the Conference Committee's work, the Conference Committee could not fulfil its obligations under article 7 of the Standing Orders without conducting its own independent evaluation. More often than not, the Conference Committee's conclusions and those of the Experts are consistent.

In the context of a number of cases this year, for example the cases of Ecuador, Colombia and Pakistan, to name a few, the Employers have set out in some detail the reasons why we believe the Experts' interpretations concerning the right to strike is not completely correct. The social and legal matter of the right to strike is not contemplated by the specific language of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 or the respective legislative histories. Moreover, reliance on the decisions of the Committee on Freedom of Association is not appropriate, because its decisions are based on general principles and are not limited to the terms and legislative histories of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 as interpreted and applied in accordance with articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention. But reliance on the Vienna Convention is not essential to reach this conclusion, because Conventions simply apply traditionally and generally accepted customary rules of interpretation of international treaties.

Perhaps more importantly the exercise of the right to strike does not take place in a vacuum. By its very nature the exercise of the right to strike not only affects the employer but the community as well. Strikes take place in different legal contexts, stages of economic and industrial development and economic circumstances. This has been the consistent position of the Employers' group since 1953. The Experts "one-size fits all" approach, particularly with regard to essential services in the public service, simply does not take into account these realities and the absence of any express provision of the right to strike in Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. Instead of simply reiterating past pronouncements on the right to strike, the Experts need to take these legal and economic factors into account and re-examine the right to strike both in the context of observations in particular cases, and in their 1994 survey on Convention Nos. 87 and 98.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. GRAY) – May I take it that the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations is adopted by the Conference?

(The report is adopted.)

THIRD AND FOURTH REPORTS OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – Our first item on the agenda is the third and fourth reports of the Credentials Committee. I would like to call on the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Ausman, Government delegate, Canada, to submit the reports.

Mr. AUSMAN (Government delegate, Canada; Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – I present to you today the third and fourth reports of the Credentials Committee which are contained in Provisional Records No. 19 (third report) and No. 22 (fourth report). These reports contain the Committee's conclusions on all the objections to credentials that have been lodged and found receivable.

Since no recommendation has been made for the invalidation of credentials, the present reports are both submitted to you for your information only.

There were ten objections in all: one concerned the representation of a member State – Zaire. In this case, the Committee considered that the objection added nothing new to the information and issues studied in a separate report. The nine other objections mainly related to the question of representativity of non-governmental delegates or advisers.

Rather than summarizing each, I will highlight the main issues that arose this year. First, an issue that did not cause major problems. This is the obligation on governments to nominate their non-governmental delegations in agreement wherever possible with the most representative organizations of employers or workers, respectively.

Whereas in one or two cases the Committee felt that the government could have done more to achieve agreement among the organizations consulted, this obligation was found to have been satisfied in all cases where it was an issue. The problem cases related to the governments' decisions after those consultations. There were in particular two cases where the objecting organization refused to attend the consultations, Togo, where the decision was left to the Government, and Nicaragua, where the organization stated that the Committee should use its discretionary powers to decide which organization most truly represented the interests of the workers or the employers. But how should this representativity be evaluated?

In two cases, Cape Verde and Nicaragua, the Committee stressed that it was necessary for governments to collect quantifiable data on these questions as different affiliated unions and different members of the various central organizations and different branches of activities ware concerned.

There was a third case, Algeria, which was more difficult. In this country the private sector has recently taken on increased importance. Not only have there been conflicting statements concerning the quantifiable data, but the Committee felt that the Government should carefully consider the question of representivity of employers' organizations in the context of the changing relationship between the public and private sectors of the economy.

The Committee's fourth report also summarizes various communications received concerning the non-fulfilment of the constitutional requirement for governments to pay the expenses of their delegations. They were from the Employers' group, and also from a number of Workers' representatives.

The Report notes an initiative taken by the Office as a result of observations made by the Committee last year to obtain information on the extent to which the requirement has been respected, and on the reasons for the inability to respect it.

Finally, I would like to thank this Conference for having appointed me to the Credentials Committee. The work was most interesting and gave me an even greater appreciation of tripartism in action, and the need for genuine representivity of the social forces at this Conference. My warm thanks, of course, also go to my very experienced colleagues on the Committee, Mr. Funes de Rioja, the Employers' member and Mr. Gray, Workers' member and Vice-President of the Conference. I also wish to thank the hard working and very helpful, and wise members of the Secretariat who guided us throughout.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference for a communication.

COMMUNICATION TO THE CONFERENCE

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I will read a letter which has been sent to Mr. Abdel-Hak, President of the International Labour Conference. The letter is dated 21 June 1993, and is from Mr. Anthony Freeman, Government delegate, United States

> "Dear Mr. President,
> The United States Government wishes to associate itself with the points made on behalf of the European Community and its member States concerning the delegation of Zaire as contained in the letter of the Government delegate of Denmark, Mr. Jorgensen, addressed to you on 15 June 1993.
> Sincerely,
> A. Freeman"

THIRD AND FOURTH REPORTS OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: NOTING

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – The Conference is invited to take note of the third and fourth reports of the Credentials Committee.

(The reports are noted.)

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON TECHNICAL COOPERATION: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We now proceed to the next item on our agenda, the report of the Committee on Technical Cooperation. I call on the Chairman of the Committee, the Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Ilabaca, Government member, Chile, Mr. Kaswarra, Employers' member, Uganda, and Mr. Brett, Workers' member, United Kingdom, as well as the Reporter, Mrs. Da Costa-Geveke, Government member, Netherlands, to come to the rostrum.

I now have the honour to ask Mrs. Da Costa-Geveke to submit the report.

Mrs. DA COSTA-GEVEKE (Government member, Netherlands; Reporter of the Committee on Technical Cooperation) – As Reporter of the Committee on Technical Cooperation, I have the honour to present its report to this session of the Conference.

The report was adopted by the Committee during its last sitting on Friday, 18 June 1993. It has been distributed as Provisional Record No. 24. The report duly reflects the discussions held in the Committee on Technical Cooperation based on the Director-General's Report VI, The role of the ILO in technical cooperation. Furthermore, it contains the texts of a resolution and conclusions on the subject which are submitted for the approval of the Conference.

The Committee started its work with a general discussion on the Director-General's Report as a whole, and subsequently on a chapter-by-chapter basis. It thus dealt with the following main issues: the review and evaluation of ILO technical cooperation in the period 1987-91, the new priorities for the 1990s, new modalities of multilateral technical cooperation and their impact on ILO activities, an active partnership on a strategic response to the new challenges, and the points for discussion as suggested in the last pages of the Director-General's Report.

The Committee then nominated a Working Party which was asked to prepare a draft resolution and conclusions. After three days of intensive debate, a draft text was finalized by the Working Party and presented to the Committee. More than 80 amendments were submitted by members of the Committee.

On Thursday, 17 June these amendments were all discussed at extended sessions. Many of them were adopted, some after a vote, and added to the text, while others failed to obtain sufficient support and were either rejected or withdrawn. The draft reports, including the resolutions and conclusions, were then examined by the Committee during its sitting on Friday, 18 June and, after some minor amendments were suggested, was adopted. It is now before the Conference for consideration.

With this introduction of the report to the Conference, my difficult but interesting mission as Reporter of the Committee on Technical Cooperation comes to an end. Looking back on the past weeks, I can say that it has not been an easy task, especially since almost all participants from the three groups in the debate felt very strongly about the subject of technical cooperation, while not necessarily agreeing on how their particular concerns could best be achieved or formulated. The Committee has worked very hard indeed to prepare a resolution and conclusions which I hope will serve their purpose, namely to give guidance to the ILO's technical cooperation programme for the next few years.

Finally, I would like to thank the Chairman of the Committee, the two Vice-Chairmen, and the members of the Committee for their trust and support. I would like to conclude by thanking the Secretariat of the Committee once again for the tireless dedication they showed when providing us with so many versions of the draft or on the strict deadlines.

In order to be able to complete the Committee's work on time, we have been working together intensively, many times in conditions which would definitely qualify as unacceptable had the relevant international labour standards been considered. Nevertheless, the job has been done and it has been a pleasure and privilege to work with you all.

Mr. KASWARRA (Employers' member, Uganda; Employer Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Technical Cooperation) – My report to you today is not a happy one, but it is in the true spirit of tripartism that we must exercise our right to take an independent stand to protect employers' interests and what we strongly believe are the interests of the ILO as a whole.

The Employers' group of the Committee on Technical Cooperation embarked upon its work nearly three weeks ago in the hope of providing guidance to the Office on the priorities for and management of technical cooperation. We approached the work with a positive attitude and a cooperative spirit in the hope that we would help effect the changes needed in ILO technical cooperation so that it may face the hard challenges before our Organization. We remain committed to this goal and to technical cooperation as a major means of action for the ILO as we move into the twenty-first century. We feel there are many positive points in the conclusions, for example the beneficial guidance concerning the management of technical cooperation, especially direct reporting for worker and employer specialists in the multidisciplinary teams. The call for rigorous oversight and evaluation in cooperation with the Governing Body and the setting of priority areas are lost in a document our group cannot support in its entirety.

Unfortunately, much of this constructive work was overshadowed by unyielding stands on the part of the Workers' group on a number of issues, especially that of linking technical cooperation with international labour standards. We believe in democracy. However, the process by which we decided upon the conclusions of this Committee could be characterized as democracy by abstention. By our calculations, only one vote reached the necessary quorum. All other amendments were not carried because there were not enough Government delegates present and voting to decide upon such critical issues as the relationship between economic development and standards or the link between standards and technical cooperation. We deeply regret that such important decisions were the result of abstention rather than their positive involvement. We further note that this situation underscores our belief that the Governing Body and its Committee on Technical Cooperation should review the entirety of the conclusions of this Committee to promote consensus and ongoing consideration of these critical issues.

We were surprised by the Workers' refusal to accept the amendments we put forward on improving labour productivity, promoting equality of opportunity and raising the priority of employment creation. Our efforts to introduce some caution into the proposal to bind ILO technical cooperation to the advice contained in the 350 or so ILO Conventions and Recommendations were more enthusiastically rebuffed. The Employers' group feels strongly that technical cooperation should aim at achieving the objectives of the ILO as broadly set out in the Declaration of Philadelphia and not necessarily as narrowly defined by existing Conventions and Recommendations.

However, we were able to support the conclusion that technical cooperation to help establish democratic and representative institutions should be consistent with the relevant standards. Moreover, we agree that the fight against child labour should be based, inter alia, on the relevant Conventions. However, many ILO Conventions and Recommendations contain detailed false prescriptions which are not always appropriate.

We were as frank then as we will be with you now. ILO standards as a whole contain many notions which are no longer relevant to the world we live in today. Most ILO standards were adopted at a time when the composition of this Organization was radically different, when the fundamental structural adjustment we are undergoing could not have been foreseen, let alone taken into account, and the worldwide unemployment crisis we are now experiencing was never an issue. Yet the Workers and some of the Governments appear to wish to hide from this fact. They simply think that ILO standards as a whole deserve the same attention – that one is as valid as the next.

In light of these extreme positions, we believe that the complementarity between international labour standards and technical cooperation needs further definition. Without such action ILO efforts to sensitize our institutions to the complementarity between standards and technical cooperation should accelerate the decline in respect for the ILO to which many speakers have referred.

It is with considerable regret that I find myself expressing such disappointment with a report upon which our group worked so hard. However, it is essential that the Conference understands that this is not a consensus document. We experienced in this Committee an attempt to transform by assumption the Office paper of November 1992 on international labour standards and technical cooperation into a tripartite consensus document of the Governing Body. Thus, I am sure you will understand the importance we attach to clearly recording our position.

With this in mind, we ask your indulgence as I briefly emphasize a number of areas where we have reservations. We object to the chapter on the synergy between international labour standards and technical cooperation because it implicitly denies that standards may not contribute to development and may, in fact, retard both social and economic progress and discourage capital investment if the needs of the country in question are not adequately taken into account. Moreover, given the limited resources available, we feel that greater use of funds for promoting the links between standards and technical cooperation is ill-advised.

I would like to repeat that we should be clear within the ILO on the complementarity between standards and technical cooperation before we begin the envisaged sensitization activities with other development institutions. Other concerns include the reference to tripartite participation where we believe consultation would be better advised and the insistence on prescribing methods for achieving equality of opportunity rather than making the goal of equality of opportunity permanent and leaving to the management and the Governing Body responsibility for the means of achieving this important goal.

Finally, we express our regret at the lack of emphasis on the role of enterprise creation and entrepreneurship as engines for employment growth. We are disappointed in the refusal to give priority to improving labour productivity and we remain convinced that the overall priority for the ILO should be to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment.

With these reservations aside, we commend the report for adoption. We would like to thank the other groups for their contribution to the debate and our Chairman for his tireless efforts in the difficult sessions and to inform them that we look forward to the ongoing debates on these important issues.

We also thank the Office, which worked very hard in preparing the report and the draft conclusions that provided the basis for our discussions. I also thank the Reporter for a job well done.

Allow me in conclusion to thank the President for his leadership of the Conference. I wish him and all delegates and advisers a safe journey home.

Mr. BRETT (Workers' member, United Kingdom; Worker Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Technical Cooperation) – I have pleasure on behalf of the Workers' group in commending this report for the consideration of the Conference.

We believe that the report endorses the correct priorities: support for democratization, poverty alleviation and the protection of workers. It strikes the right balance of conditions for synergy between international labour standards and technical cooperation. Paragraph 14 of the conclusions is most important in this regard, as is paragraph 16 which effectively endorses the guidelines discussed at the 252nd Session of the Governing Body, held in March 1992. We are also pleased to see the prominence and strength given to the promotion of tripartism and social dialogue in paragraph 18 of the conclusions.

The Workers' group particularly appreciates the strong statement made by the Employers' Vice-Chairman on this point during the general debate.

The report also provides valuable guidance for the Governing Body and its newly constituted Committee on Technical Cooperation. It stresses that technical cooperation should help member States achieve progress towards the ratification and application of international labour standards. The report also focuses technical cooperation on a selected number of priorities central to the mandate of the ILO and calls for a huge effort to promote tripartism.

In addition I feel sure that the Governing Body's Committee on Technical Cooperation will be able to make effective use of the paragraphs on pages 33 and 34 concerning programme implementation and evaluation.

The report gives due prominence and support for the active partnership policy and the concept of multidisciplinary teams. The Workers' group is conscious of the practical organizational challenges posed for the ILO by the introduction of multidisciplinary teams. Clear lines of authority, accountability, reporting, and communication have to be established between the teams, existing regional structures and headquarters. It is most important that the process of decentralization should not lead to any loosening of organizational accountability to the Governing Body, nor detract from the expert technical capabilities or overall responsibilities of headquarters.

Again we hope that the report will provide valuable guidance for the Governing Body and its Committee on Technical Cooperation.

Finally, I would like to highlight the call in the report for the strengthening of employers' and workers' organizations and the application of greater pressure on the Bretton Woods institutions to include the ILO in their policy formulation and implementation. Both these matters need pursuing with renewed vigour.

We should never forget that democracy can be lost much more easily than it can be won and that tripartism and strong and independent organizations of workers and employers are essential to the maintenance and development of democracy, whether it be in the emerging democracies of Africa or Asia, or in those countries of Europe currently in transition.

I should thank the Employers for the strength of their views and the trenchant way they put them. I cannot say that I agree with the Employers' interpretation of events. Amendments that were proposed by the Employers were not carried because in the main they sought to weaken the links between standards and technical cooperation; they were not carried because an insufficient number of governments were present to meet the quorum; they were not carried because governments did not support them. I don't believe the question of labour productivity is central to the mandate of the ILO. I think equality of opportunity was strengthened by amendments proposed by governments and would have been weakened by the amendments proposed by any Employers. None the less we appreciate the Employers' endeavours and we are pleased they can join with us in commending the report to you even if they have some reservations.

In closing I would like to express the appreciation of the Workers' group to our Chairman, Mr. Ilabaca, for his wisdom and tolerance and to our quite exceptional Reporter, Mrs. Da Costa-Geveke, and last but not least to the secretariat, translators and behind-the-scenes staff who performed miracles to ensure our work and the report before you were completed on time.

I have pleasure in commending the report to the Conference.

Original Spanish: Mr. ILABACA (Government member, Chile; Chairman of the Committee on Technical Cooperation) – I would like to thank this gathering for the honour paid to me as Government delegate of my country in electing me to the Chair of the Committee on Technical Cooperation at this session of the Conference.

I would like to take advantage of this opportunity to thank all those who cooperated so much and so loyally to bring about the success of our work, but if I praised them all I would be taking too much advantage of your time. But I would like to say that this was work well done, responsibly done and led to a result which I think is satisfactory and promising for all.

But since you gave me a mandate, and since it is not possible for me to act both as Government delegate of Chile and Chairman of a Committee, I would like to say to you in this plenary session not to remember Chile as being the country which chaired a Committee, nor would I ask you to think of it as a country which had a technical problem in the sphere of social security. We have many more and much more important problems, I wish this was the only one.

The Governments of the developing countries have numerous problems. My Government, in full democracy and in full freedom, is trying to solve these problems with the cooperation and the help of all – workers and employers. And I would like to say to you that it is a source of pride to me that at this session of the Conference no Workers' member of the Chilean Workers' delegation raised a voice to protest even once against the Chilean Government. This fills me with pride which I want to share with you.

I should like to thank the President for his kindness and I repeat that my country is ready to cooperate, from within the Governing Body, in the reform of this Organization for the benefit of all and for the welfare of the most underprivileged of this world.

Original Spanish: Mrs. HERNANDEZ OLIVA (Government adviser and substitute delegate, Cuba) – The question of technical cooperation under debate at this Conference introduces new perspectives and methods which could be beneficial since they advocate greater efficiency, a better use of resources and the achievement of the ILO objectives as defined in the Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia.

I would like to stress the importance of the link between technical cooperation and international labour standards, since these are the concrete expressions of the general objectives of the Organization.

The conclusions submitted to our approval recognize this conceptual basis for technical cooperation, but they also contain some contradictory aspects which may lead to doubts or to interpretations which go beyond the ILO's mandate.

The multidisciplinary teams are appropriate vehicles for achieving the aims of technical cooperation. But there are other means which we also consider very important, and which will enable the Organization to get closer to the realities and needs of its member States.

However, some doubt the effectiveness and orientation of these activities. In this connection, my delegation considers that in view of the opinions already put forward in the Governing Body and in the Committee on the Application of Standards at the last session of the Conference concerning the need to do away with any idea of linking technical assistance to political considerations in terms of compliance with international labour standards, these teams should serve all the States in their respective regions without any exclusions or preferences, taking as a starting-point for their activities the needs and priorities laid down by governments, in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, and on the basis of national interests, with priority given to the programmes related to job creation, alleviation of poverty, improvement of conditions of life and work and the social protection of workers. All of these are aspects that fall within the ILO's terms of reference.

I add my voice to those calling for the adoption of this report, subject to the considerations I have just expressed, which I would like to have included in the Record of Proceedings.

Mr. JONZON (Government delegate, Sweden) – I simply call the attention of my colleagues to paragraph 23 of the Conclusions. Due to that paragraph, which is very precise indeed, this whole document will no doubt be an important input to the preparations of the meeting of the Committee on Technical Cooperation of the Governing Body next November. Therefore, we endorse these conclusions with the greatest pleasure.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – I move on to the adoption of the Report. The adoption does not include only the report, but also the resolution and the conclusions submitted by the Committee.

We start by reviewing the Report and adopting it paragraph by paragraph. Are there any comments regarding paragraphs 1 to 96?

Original Spanish: Mrs. JIMENEZ (Government adviser and substitute delegate, Mexico) – The Government delegation of Mexico is aware of the importance of technical cooperation as a privileged instrument for achieving the objectives of the ILO and of its contribution to the development of countries and social progress. We therefore wish to express our appreciation at the setting up of this committee. As regards the report, we are sorry not to be able to support it entirely, particularly as regards its conclusions, and we would like to put on record that if the Committee had been able to vote, Mexico would have abstained because of our concern at the way in which the essential priorities proposed for the present decade were established.

In fact the first priority above all others were not recognized, namely the ILO's mandate for activities to promote development and social justice, such as the creation of employment. For this same reason, the Government delegation of Mexico, in supporting the Programme and Budget for 1994-95, reserved its position concerning the priorities laid down by the ILO, as it also did in the Governing Body on the document respecting international labour standards and technical cooperation.

We are concerned at the fact that the concept of cooperation may be distorted if it is not endowed with the guarantees to exclude any political conditionality from technical cooperation activities. We are also concerned at the fact that the paragraphs on priority areas were adopted without the consensus of the Committee and with the abstention of a full group, especially since tripartism is one of the basic principles on which all the practical activities of the ILO are based.

I cannot fail to mention the surprise of my delegation at the fact that precisely at a Committee on Technical Cooperation it should have been considered that the training of human resources does not count among the essential priorities of technical cooperation for the 1990s, and we here are talking about the fourth decade of the International Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade. As structural change policies are being applied in most parts of the world when the training of human resources is an essential factor for the success of these policies over and above purely economic circumstances, human resource development is an essential condition for true economic and social progress in any part of the world.

For all these reasons, the Government delegation of Mexico wishes to put on record its reservation concerning the priorities for technical cooperation laid down in this report, the resolution and the conclusions concerning the role of the ILO in technical cooperation.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – If there are no objections, I shall take it that the report of the Committee on Technical Cooperation, paragraphs 1 to 96, is adopted, with the reservations expressed by the delegation of Mexico.

(The report is adopted, paragraphs 1 to 96.)

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ROLE OF THE ILO IN TECHNICAL COOPERATION, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON TECHNICAL COOPERATION: ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We move on to the adoption of the resolution concerning the role of the ILO in technical cooperation.

If there are no objections, I shall take it that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

CONCLUSIONS CONCERNING THE ROLE OF THE ILO IN TECHNICAL COOPERATION, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON TECHNICAL COOPERATION: ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the adoption of the conclusions concerning the role of the ILO in technical cooperation, part by part, paragraphs 1 to 52.

If there are no objections, I shall take it that paragraphs 1 to 52 are adopted.

(The conclusions are adopted.)

REPORT OF THE RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – Now we move on to the third item on our agenda – the report of the Resolutions Committee, which is found in Provisional Record No. 26. It is my pleasure to invite officers of the Committee to come to the rostrum – the Chairman of the Committee and Reporter, Mr. Mascia, Government member, Italy, the Employer Vice-Chairman, Mr. Castle, the Employers' member, United Kingdom, and the Worker Vice-Chairman, Mr. Tapiola, Workers' member, Finland.

I give the floor to Mr. Mascia, Chairman and Reporter of the Committee, to present the Committee's report.

Mr. MASCIA (Government member, Italy; Chairman and Reporter of the Resolutions Committee) – It is my pleasure and my privilege to present on behalf of the Resolutions Committee the results of our deliberations as they are reflected in the report before you. The document includes the draft text of the resolution adopted unanimously and without voting by the Committee. In fact, the Committee first decided to merge four draft resolutions into a main one on social protection and then to give to that resolution the highest priority among the 12 referred to it.

The resolution, which concerns social protection and the alleviation of unemployment and poverty and the social dimension of structural adjustment and the transition to a market economy, deals with an important subject containing a number of important issues of concern to a large number of people in many countries. The resolution in fact echoes the Report of the Director-General to the present session of the Conference on social insurance and social protection.

I am glad to report that we had an in-depth discussion in which a number of delegates participated and which included the submission of some 70 amendments. Contributions to our work came from all circles, from developing as well as industrialized countries, from countries in transition to a market economy, and from the Employers' group as well as from the Workers' group.

All agreed that the resolution adopted will strengthen the capacity of the International Labour Organization to play a major role in helping governments in all parts of the world to deal with the social consequences of structural adjustment. The resolution invites, for example, government and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organizations to incorporate social protection measures in the initiation, design and implementation of structural adjustment programmes and programmes of transition to a market economy by taking into account their impact on employment, incomes, poverty and the well-being of the whole population. They are also invited to make the alleviation of poverty and unemployment and the need to promote job creation the principal goals of their economic and social policies.

The resolution refers specifically to the World Summit for Social Development and invites them to continue to promote tripartite cooperation in this regard. The Governing Body is also invited to ask the Director-General to take measures to ensure an essential contribution by the ILO through its tripartite structure to the preparation, convening and follow-up of the World Summit, giving particular emphasis to issues which are within the scope of the ILO mandate, such as the elimination of poverty, the promotion of full, freely chosen and productive employment, social protection and freedom of association.

The Director-General is requested to ensure that the problems of poverty, exclusion and unemployment, as well as the need to promote job creation and access to employment and social protection for disadvantaged groups, are given due attention in the preparation of the Second High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment. He is requested to develop, intensify and institutionalize close cooperation with the international financial institutions, such as the IMF, the World Bank and the regional reconstruction and development banks.

I do not wish to elaborate further on the resolution you have read, but I cannot conclude without mentioning the fact that this year we tested the electronic vote in the Resolutions Committee. However, for this first test we retained the traditional voting system and the electronic vote had no legal value. The experiment gave encouraging results, although it was still performed on a roll-call basis and not simultaneously as it will be in the future when we can use it alone.

It was a very good year for the Resolutions Committee, as you can judge from the quality of our work. Due to my lack of experience as Chairman of an ILO meeting, I knew that my task in the Committee would be a difficult one, especially in the Resolutions Committee. Yet I can admit today that day by day, as we proceeded with our deliberations, I started to enjoy my new job and I am very proud to say that the Committee carried out its work in a most cooperative spirit and in an excellent informal atmosphere. As proof of this constructive mood, let me say that the Committee had to resort to a vote only once, an achievement with few precedents in the Resolutions Committee.

In mentioning this very constructive atmosphere, I would like to express my warm thanks to Mr. Castle, the Employer Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee, and to Mr. Tapiola, the Worker Vice-Chairman, whose talents and experience helped me considerably in my work. I also wish to thank the Government delegates for their trust, their assistance and their positive contribution to the work of the Committee. Finally, I remain in debt to the secretariat for their invaluable support and for their reassuring competence.

Mr. CASTLE (Employers' member, United Kingdom; Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee) – I am here as an Employers' representative and I know that in our plenary from time to time I was called Mr. Tapiola, so we are quite happy to change from time to time.

The fact that I stand here one day earlier than I was expecting to and that I shall be able to see my grand-daughter one day earlier than I had planned, must be a tribute to the efficiency and wisdom with which you have led this session of the Conference and with which your Vice-Presidents have contributed to help you to lead us to such an early close.

On behalf of the Employers' members of the Resolutions Committee at the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference, I am pleased to recommend without reservation the adoption by the Conference of two things: first, the report of the Committee, and secondly, the resolution concerning social protection and the alleviation of unemployment and poverty, and the social dimension of structural adjustment and transition to a market economy.

It has been put together with meticulous attention to detail. Every word has been carefully considered. It is a balanced resolution. It is the product of the search for consensus by persons from different backgrounds, different cultures and coming from countries in different stages of economic development. It is not a Shakespearean classic, it is a good ILO resolution, in good ILO English, dealing with some important problems prevalent in the world today.

And the Employers' group is particularly pleased that it invites governments, and where appropriate, employers' and workers' organizations to take measures to protect workers to the fullest extent possible against the adverse effects of structural change. May I add that in this instance perhaps this should apply to the members of the Resolutions Committee who will be subject to structural change not next year but the year after.

Governments are invited to develop policies for economic growth and employment generation which will contribute to the strengthening of social protection systems based on the principles of ensuring solidarity and shared responsibility. This is certainly something that we endorse. We also endorse the fact that governments are invited to make the alleviation of poverty and unemployment and the need to promote job creation principal goals of economic and social policy.

We welcome the fact that we were able to invite them to encourage policies which reduce exclusion and marginalization. Through the Governing Body and the Director-General we have invited the ILO to provide advisory services and technical cooperation in the context of these objectives. And we have requested the ILO to ensure that the problems of poverty exclusion and unemployment, a need to promote job creation and access to employment and social protection and the disadvantaged groups are given due attention in the preparation of the Second High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment. We also hope that the ILO will take the measures necessary to ensure the essential contribution of the ILO at the World Summit for Social Development.

Although the Resolutions Committee has only one resolution to put before the Conference it has not wasted its time, contrary to what some observers may think. In six working sessions, or in the 18 hours at our disposal, the Committee had 58 individual statements during the general discussion of the first three draft resolutions, with approximately 70 amendments proposed in the case of the resolution which we eventually adopted. I think we would have been hard put to do much more than that.

The Employers' group was grateful that so many members of the Resolutions Committee voted in favour of the draft resolution, submitted by Employers, to give it a second place in the order of priorities this year. The draft resolution concerning the commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the ILO was intended to set the scene for a full and constructive debate about the future role of the ILO which is likely to be held in 1994. It was intended to start a thinking process, it was not an attack on anyone. A thinking process which might lead to the adoption of a charter, containing the fundamental orientations of the ILO for the next 75 years, perhaps much like the Declaration of Philadelphia had been in 1944.

But in spite of the high priority given to the draft resolution, the Employers' group noticed that some members of the Committee had misunderstood the objective of the resolution. I would like to take this opportunity, as we did during the general discussion in Committee, to reaffirm the Employers' continued commitment to the fundamental values of the ILO. The draft proposal was intended to initiate a forward-looking discussion to define how these values should be given expression in the future.

All healthy and worthwhile organizations remain healthy and relevant because of their willingness to look at themselves from time to time to review their priorities and methods of work, and the ILO should do the same.

The Employers' group is satisfied that although time did not allow the proposed resolution to be discussed in detail, a wide-ranging general discussion was started in the Committee, and as far as we are concerned the main objective of proposing the resolution has been achieved.

While satisfied on this count, the Employers' group was nevertheless disappointed that time did not allow the Committee to adopt the proposed resolutions on human rights and child labour. These are subjects which in the interest of social justice need the attention of governments, employers' and workers' organizations everywhere.

This year we experimented with electronic voting in our committee when selecting the order of priority for the discussion of the proposed resolutions. Next year the Resolutions Committee will operate under a new schedule of work.

It has now been 20 years since I first took an interest in the work of the Resolutions Committee. In view of this experience I would like to permit myself to make a few comments on the proposed changes. During the weekend I examined various scenarios to assess what benefit the change to electronic voting would bring to the operation of our committee and what impact the new work schedules would have on the efficiency of our work, and they are here.

In the case of electronic voting I have come to the conclusion that although this will speed up the process of voting and of receiving the results of the vote, electronic voting will not make any significant difference to the pace at which the overall work of the committee will be able to proceed. I recommend therefore that careful consideration be given to the cost-benefit elements involved in the move to electronic voting in the Resolutions Committee before a final decision is taken.

In the case of the new work schedules, I believe that in a standard year the Committee will be hard pressed to achieve the general discussion of three resolutions and the adoption of two. I also estimate that in a year in which accelerated progress is possible because all the resolutions selected for discussion are simple and non-controversial, it would be unrealistic to expect the Resolutions Committee to do more than achieve the general discussion of four resolutions and the adoption of three, if they are lucky.

This raises the question of assessment of the role and quality of the work of the Resolutions Committee. All other committees in the Conference have clear missions and clear objectives that are easily understood. In the case of the Resolutions Committee, it is difficult to find a common perception of its mission and of its objectives among the delegates attending the Conference. Is it not time for the performance of the Resolutions Committee to be assessed against a set of more meaningful criteria than an inflated expectation of the number of resolutions to be adopted during a Conference? Is this not one of the issues that could be looked at during the forthcoming review of the work of this Organization? I believe it is.

Before I leave this rostrum I would like to pay a tribute to our Chairman, who conducted our work with a light touch and with the elegance that is so characteristic of the artists of his native Italy. It is always a pleasure to compete with Mr. Tapiola, either in composing music for études or pulling rabbits out of a hat or in playing with words. I have done so for many years and in different areas and I hope to be able to continue.

Mr. TAPIOLA (Workers' member, Finland; Worker Vice-Chairman) – I must admit that sometimes last week I had an uneasy feeling. The going was somewhat rough in the traditional way of the Resolutions Committee, at the pace of about 10 minutes per amendment – and there were quite a few of them – and, short of a record vote, most other measures allowed in the book were used and even the Legal Adviser was reminded that the Committee existed. But in the end all went well and I am convinced that not only the Workers' group but the whole Conference can be satisfied.

The Resolutions Committee continues to function and to produce texts which are not only in the mainstream but in immediate touch with the core of the ILO. In addition, as a by-product to the resolutions we actually adopt we get a good reading of what else is on the minds of the constituents. On occasions this can be as important for the future of the ILO as the specific sets of words we adopt on a given topic. I hope that this will be remembered in the not too distant future, 1995, when we have no Resolutions Committee, if someone wants the Conference to express its view on something he or she feels to be timely and important.

The Resolutions Committee is the instrument with which to take the pulse of the Conference, to sort out priority concerns of its constituents and even individual delegates. I know that we have agreed to shelve this Committee every second year after 1995 and I am not crying over spilt milk here. However, I just want to leave you with one modest little question. Would we be better able to anticipate our discussions next year if we had not had a Resolutions Committee this year? I am not suggesting an answer as, by definition, the Workers' Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee is not impartial on this issue.

Before addressing the outcome of the Resolutions Committee and the very well prepared report, let me make some observations on the work of the Committee itself.

We have been blessed with good chairpersons over the last years, and Mr. Mascia joins a line of eminent predecessors. All of them have carried out their tasks in a creative manner, one of them has presided excellently over the Apartheid Committee this year. I particularly remember that the other year Mr. Vargas Campos suggested, on the basis of his own experience, improvements in the methods of work of the Committee, such as a more frequent use of working groups.

This year we in fact expanded on a practice, which was only cautiously and furtively used earlier, of having short breaks for consultations and even joint drafting, there and then on the floor of the Committee.

This process has helped us to know one another and one another's concerns still better. Maybe we can build on this practice for the future.

Another observation is that, if we work a bit more on the practice of merging texts, we may well find out that the most important – and most productive – part of the work of the Committee may sometimes be done before the priority vote, not after it. With shorter Conferences, this is something we should seriously contemplate.

Of course merging is possible only if we address the same priority issues. In that respect, this year's outcome is interesting. It would seem obvious that there is significant common concern regarding, for instance, human and trade union rights and child labour.

It is also equally evident that we have a need to discuss in depth the way in which our Organization functions, including its standard-setting activities in the light of the 75th anniversary of the ILO next year.

The Workers' group was opposed to the way in which the role and responsibilities of the ILO and its standard-setting activities were presented in some of the draft resolutions; but they did get a significant amount of votes when priorities were determined. We of course happen to believe that at least part of the voters were misled, but we certainly cannot ignore the result, and we will focus on our own argument.

As we indicated in the general discussion on the resolution which received the second highest priority – but did not make it much further – the Workers' group is ready to continue to treat the issue of intensifying the ILO's work constructively, and we will be putting forward our own proposals to that effect. We may even eventually produce a resolution whose text matches its title and takes account of everybody's concerns.

I should now like to turn to the resolution concerning social protection and the alleviation of unemployment and poverty and the social dimension of structural adjustment and transition to a market economy.

Usually, our resolutions have a rather long, even indeterminable time-frame. This time we have been more specific. The World Summit on Social Development will take place early in 1995. We have a priority programme in the ILO on poverty in the biennium 1994-95. We expect that there will be a High-Level Meeting on Structural Adjustment and Employment next year.

The resolution treats these issues separately, while linking them together.

The main immediate aim is to put the leadership and support of the Conference behind the ILO's preparations for the Social Summit. The Governing Body and its Working Party on the Summit will no doubt use this resolution as a guide for their contribution to the preparations.

The resolution, among other things, emphasizes tripartism in the preparations and in the Summit itself, including tripartite participation in it. I should like to express the hope that all national tripartite ILO Committees will soon discuss their role and the participation of workers' and employers' organizations in the Summit process and in the Summit itself.

The long-term aim of the resolution is the follow-up of both the Social Summit and the ILO's programme against poverty. The resolution does not say in specific terms what that follow-up should be. It can involve a variety of things: research, technical cooperation, reaffirming or revising existing standards, or proposing new ones in the field of social protection. That is something which will be debated and decided in due course.

This resolution pays particular attention to the concerns of developing countries and countries in transition. I would like to thank the Government representatives from those groups as well as those from the industrialized market economies for their cooperation in the Committee.

My particular thanks go to the representatives of Germany and the Russian Federation with whom we negotiated a merger, and to the Government representatives of India, Tunisia and Egypt, with whom we had a constructive dialogue on how to get our message across. Naturally these thanks extend also to the governments who are always active in the Committee, including the Governments of the United Kingdom, Denmark, Sweden, France, etc.

I have already said that Mr. Mascia will join the ranks of great Chairpersons of the Committee, and the Office has been its usual friendly and competent self.

Finally, having told you how rewarding it has been to work with governments, let me say that all of this would not have been possible without the alert, knowledgeable, skilful and sometimes deviously constructive participation of the Employers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Castle.

The other day in a private discussion, he heard me say something which seemed to surprise him a little. So I would like to repeat from this podium what I said and propose that the day the Conference faces chaos because it has not scheduled a Resolutions Committee, I shall be ready to join him in finding an emergency solution, not only in a spirit of enterprise but also in a cost-effective manner.

In the meanwhile, I propose that we now adopt this report and the resolution and continue to prepare to adopt more resolutions in the future.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – If there are no further speakers, we can proceed to the adoption of the report, that is paragraphs 1 to 335. If there are no objections, I shall consider the report adopted.

(The report is adopted, paragraphs 1 to 335.)

RESOLUTION CONCERNING SOCIAL PROTECTION AND THE ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND POVERTY, AND THE SOCIAL DIMENSION OF STRUCTURAL ADJUSTMENT AND TRANSITION TO A MARKET ECONOMY, SUBMITTED BY THE RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE: ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – If there are no objections, can I consider that the resolution concerning social protection and the alleviation of unemployment and poverty, and the social dimension of structural adjustment and transition to a market economy is adopted?

Provisional Record No. 19: page 14, left-hand column, speech by Mrs. Célestin Saurel, Minister of Social Affairs, Haiti. In the second full paragraph, the second sentence should begin: “Another way of governing can inspire ...”.

Provisional Record No. 25: on page 31 the third paragraph beginning “In addition ...” should be deleted and on pages 31 and 32, the text between the fourth full paragraph of the right-hand column (“The Workers' members ...”) and the end of the third full paragraph of the right-hand column on page 32 (“... upon their request.”) should be removed and added to the end of the information concerning Cuba (Convention No. 87) on page 38, and preceded by the following paragraph:

“In addition, a Government representative reiterated the written information presented by her Government with respect to the right of workers to establish trade union organizations as they wished in conformity with section 13 of the Labour Code. As for the conclusions formulated by the Committee on Freedom of Association mentioned by the Experts, she stated that they had been changed at the 286th Session of the Governing Body and that independently of any interpretation the real and objective fact was that the person who had made the propaganda of the ICFTU was not a trade unionist and, in addition, he had not followed up, in writing, the letter containing the request for information which had served as the basis for the ICFTU's complaint.”

Provisional Record No. 25: The beginning of the first sentence in the observation concerning Japan on page 40 (Convention No. 87), should be replaced by the following:

“A Government representative stated that the basic observations of the Government on the question of the right to organize of fire-fighting personnel had been given in its previous annual reports sent to the Office and that since 1990 periodic consultations between the responsible ministries and the All-Prefectural Municipal Workers' Union (JICHIRO) had been taking place and they had agreed to consult each other so as to find a solution ...”.

Provisional Record No. 25: On page 51 the following should be added after the observations of the Committee concerning Japan (Convention No. 100):

“The Government member of Japan stated that she had a few things to say about the beginning of the conclusions adopted by the Committee, although she was not asking for changes. The beginning of the conclusions was an inexact citation of the Government which had not stated that it intended to introduce changes of policies directly aimed at applying the Convention but rather that it wished to examine related policies which would result in the narrowing of the average wage gaps between men and women which was an indirect aim of the Convention.”

President: Mr. Abdel-Hak

COMMUNICATION TO THE CONFERENCE

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I have pleasure in informing the Conference that the Director-General of the ILO has registered the ratification by Japan of the Hygiene (Commerce and Offices), Convention, 1964 (No. 120). This brings the total number of ratifications of international labour Conventions to 5,953.

I also have pleasure in announcing that the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina has confirmed that it continues to be bound by the obligations of 66 Conventions ratified by the former Yugoslavia which were in force in its territory when it became an independent State.

The Republic of Croatia has confirmed that it considers itself bound by the obligations of 24 Conventions ratified by the former Yugoslavia which were in force in its territory when it became an independent State.

The Republic of Estonia has confirmed that it continues to be bound by the obligations of 21 Conventions it ratified between 1922 and 1938.

The Republic of Kyrgyzstan has confirmed that it continues to be bound by the obligations of 42 Conventions ratified by the former USSR, which were in force in its territory when it became an independent State.

Lastly, the Slovak Republic has confirmed that it continues to be bound by the obligations of 57 Conventions ratified by the former Czechoslovakia which were in force in its territory when it became an independent State.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON PART-TIME WORK: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We now come to the Report of the Committee on Part-time Work. I have pleasure in asking Mr. Rood, Government member, Netherlands, Chairman of the Committee; Mr. Noakes, Employers' member, Australia, Vice-Chairman; Mrs. Van de Burg, Workers' member Netherlands, Vice-Chairwoman; and Mrs. Samuel, Government member, Cyprus, Reporter of the Committee, to come to the rostrum.

I have the honour to ask Mrs. Samuel, Reporter of the Committee, to submit the report.

Mrs. SAMUEL (Government member, Cyprus) – It has been my pleasure to serve as the Reporter of the Committee on Part-time Work. The Committee was assigned the difficult task of developing international labour standards covering a very important but controversial phenomenon. Today, I am proud and happy to inform the Conference that all the predictions that life in the Committee on Part-time Work would be difficult, if not impossible, were completely wrong. Thanks to the very able chairmanship of Mr. Rood, the constructive attitude of both Vice-Chairpersons, Mr. Noakes and Mrs. Van de Burg, the conciliatory interventions of the Government members of the Committee, the careful work of the drafting Committee and, of course, the wise guidance and assistance by the representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Dumont, and his team, the Committee has managed to carry out its work in an efficient way and has prepared a firm foundation for next year's discussions.

Part-time work now involves more than 60 million workers in industrial market economies, and as we learned in the Committee, it is of increasing interest to developing countries. A very large proportion of these workers are women.

Part-time work has come to be widely accepted because it offers advantages for both employers and workers. Employers are better able to cover peak periods of demand and in general to adapt schedules to the requirements of the enterprise. Workers may for their own personal reasons, such as for example their family responsibilities, have a preference for this type of employment. Moreover, part-time work can contribute to the expansion of employment and increase flexibility in the labour market.

The constructive work of the Committee was based on two important ideas that were accepted by everyone. The first is that part-time work should be freely chosen and not imposed on workers. Agreement on this did much to allay the fears of the workers. The second important idea was that protection of part-time workers should be considered in comparison to full-time workers with the same type of employment relationship and with the same or a similar type of work or occupation. In this case, it was the employers who were reassured.

The Report that you have before you details the deliberations that were held in the Committee. I hope that it will be widely studied before next year, because it treats a number of key questions in a very serious way. I will not attempt to summarize all that we discussed, but I would like to mention the most important points that have been adopted.

First, the Committee decided that the Conference should adopt international labour standards on part-time work, and these standards should take the form of a Convention completed by a Recommendation.

In spite of the reservations of the Employers' members, this is a very significant result that shows the vitality of the tripartite processes of our Organization.

The definition of "part-time worker" overcame a number of problems of interpretation and is one of the most fundamental results of the work of the Committee. As I have already noted, it is based on the consideration of part-time workers in relation to comparable full-time workers.

The proposed Convention contains a number of provisions that increase its flexibility for ratifying countries. The most important is the possibility of excluding particular categories of workers or of enterprises from its scope, the coverage of which would raise problems of a substantial nature. This provision and others led many governments to indicate that they foresaw real possibilities for ratification.

The proposed Convention provides that more favourable protection established by other international labour Conventions should not be affected and that measures should be taken to ensure that part-time workers receive the same protection as comparable full-time workers concerning the right to organize, occupational safety and health and discrimination in employment and occupation. It also provides that basic wages should not be lower for part-time workers than comparable full-time workers.

Other measures in the Convention relate to statutory social security schemes, maternity protection, termination of employment and paid annual leave and public holidays. For these areas in which part-time workers should enjoy equivalent conditions to those of comparable full-time workers, yet another form of flexibility is provided through the possibility of thresholds for access to this protection, established and reviewed in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers.

The promotion of part-time work proved very controversial, but it was possible to reach agreement to include in the Convention measures to facilitate access to productive and freely chosen part-time work meeting the needs of employers and workers. These measures include the review of legislation that may prevent or discourage recourse to or acceptance of part-time work, the use of employment services to identify and publicize possibilities for part-time work and special attention to the needs and preferences of specific groups of workers.

It was also agreed to include a provision on the transfer of workers from full-time to part-time work or vice versa, which should be freely chosen within limits.

As you can see, a Convention is proposed which is flexible and ratifiable by a large number of member States. The interests of employers and workers are well balanced. This is an extremely encouraging and, if I may say so, somewhat unexpected result.

The proposed Recommendation complements the Convention by illustrating how it may be applied and by indicating additional areas to which protection for part-time workers should be extended. It covers, among other points, the consultation of workers and their representatives on the general introduction or extension of part-time work, written or other information for part-time workers on their specific conditions of employment, adaptation of social security schemes, access to private occupational schemes that supplement social security, compensation, access to welfare facilities, work schedules, leave, dismissal, transfers and access to training, career opportunities and occupational mobility. It also incorporates a controversial provision that where obligations on employers depend on the number of their employees, part-time workers should be given less weight than full-time workers unless this would not be appropriate, for example for reasons of occupational safety and health.

In a nutshell it can be said that the Committee on Part-time Work has done an excellent job, thanks to its officers, its members and the support of the Office.

I invite the Conference to adopt the report and conclusions of the Committee. I also invite you to adopt the resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the International Labour Conference an item entitled "Part-time work".

Mr. NOAKES (Employers' member, Australia; Employer Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Part-time Work) – Please allow me to congratulate the President on his election to this high office and on the distinguished manner in which he has presided over the deliberations of this session of the International Labour Conference.

The Conference now has before it the report of the Committee on Part-time Work, a report which represents the outcome of the first discussion of this item.

This is a report which should receive the support of the Conference, constituting as it does an excellent record of the Committee's proceedings.

The Employer members of the Committee entered into the discussions with a firm position of opposition to the adoption of standards on part-time work and that remains their position at the end of the first discussion.

They have stressed the importance of part-time work in many countries and its indispensable contribution to the efficient functioning of modern economies.

Part-time work is in fact a legitimate pattern of working activity which has grown significantly in importance in recent decades. There are of course sound reasons for these developments. Structural change has resulted in the growth of service industries which by their nature require a highly flexible method of operation in order to meet consumer demands and requirements. Furthermore, the growing complexity of many traditional industries requires extended working patterns and the use of part-time workers in order to supplement full-time workers.

These developments have coincided with a desire on the part of employees themselves to have a greater degree of freedom of choice about their working arrangements. Many employees seek to combine their family responsibilities, their education and training or their retirement plans with part-time work. There has thus emerged a growing consensus between employers and employees about the advantages of part-time work in various circumstances.

In addition, part-time work plays an important role in job creation and is especially significant for small businesses, which have in many countries held a dominant position in relation to the provision of employment opportunities. Frequently, part-time work enables work experience and skills to be obtained which would otherwise not be obtained and employees are thus able to use part-time work as a stepping-stone to full-time work, if that is what they wish.

These developments have led to the acceptance of part-time work as a normal and legitimate form of working activity.

The Employer members of the Committee were therefore pleased to note that the economic importance of part-time work was recognized both in the Committee's discussions and in the texts now presented.

Nevertheless, they remain convinced that part-time work is not a suitable subject for regulation through ILO instruments, since by its very nature it requires a high degree of flexibility and any instrument must detract from that flexibility. This, of course, would be particularly the case in the event of the adoption of a Convention.

Therefore, while we support the adoption of this report, we remain at this stage opposed to the eventual adoption of any instrument.

The discussions within the Committee were carried out in a highly constructive manner and this resulted in a number of changes to the Office text. Some of these changes will be welcomed by Employers.

The definition of part-time work is central to the consideration of the Committee's report. It was a matter of major concern to us that the original text did not differentiate between the distinct types of part-time work and thus it encouraged inappropriate comparisons between part-time work with a high degree of regularity or continuity and other forms of part-time work such as casual, temporary or seasonal work which do not have those characteristics.

The concept of a "comparable full-time worker" which has been incorporated into the definition and into many of the operative provisions of the proposed instruments represents a much better approach. It means that comparisons will only be made between part-time workers and full-time workers where there is a similar type of employment relationship and where the same type of work is being carried out.

This definition is central to both proposed instruments and its effect on enterprise operations and costs needs to receive further careful consideration.

There are a number of provisions in the proposed instruments which also need to be carefully considered and about which employers are particularly concerned and I wish to mention, briefly, some of those provisions.

Firstly, the proposed instruments seek to provide extensive protection for part-time workers in the area of social security. The relevant provisions raise complex economic and social issues which in our view did not receive sufficient consideration in our discussions. For example, the cost effects on current schemes and proposed future schemes of social security will need to be thought through in the period leading up to next year's discussion. The concept of progressive reduction of thresholds for participation of part-time workers in such schemes also needs to be carefully assessed for its administrative and other cost effects.

Secondly, and in a similar context, the provisions dealing with the treatment of part-time workers in relation to private occupational schemes which supplement or replace statutory social security schemes will cause concern to employers.

Thirdly, stronger provisions are required in the texts concerning the proportional calculation of part-time workers when thresholds for the imposition of obligations on employers are being applied. This is a matter of great importance to small businesses for which these thresholds provide protection from cost disadvantages.

Fourthly, there are a number of provisions of the conclusions which will affect the flexibility of operation of establishments which employ, or wish to employ, part-time workers. These include the provisions concerning the need for consultation about the general introduction or extension of part-time work, the totally inappropriate suggestion that changes in agreed work schedules should be subject to restrictions and the similarly inappropriate notion of a right to transfer to part-time work in certain circumstances.

Fifthly, the provisions which seek to establish protection for part-time workers in relation to basic wages and financial compensation additional to basic wages will result in additional costs for employers of part-time workers and thus constitute a disincentive to part-time work. The same can be said about the protection envisaged in relation to maternity, termination of employment, paid annual leave and paid public holidays, and the proposed progressive reduction of thresholds for such protection.

Finally, I wish to say something about the promotional measures for part-time work which are contained in the conclusions.

It is clear that the Governing Body, in deciding to place the item of part-time work on the Conference agenda, expected coverage of both the protective and promotional aspects of part-time work. It is also clear that the Office text has been weakened to a considerable extent as the result of a reluctance on the part of some governments to support promotional measures in this area. In the second discussion we will seek a strengthening of these provisions so that part-time work can, to the fullest extent, play its important role in job creation.

In short, we will approach next year's discussions with a determination to secure substantial improvements in the conclusions now being presented.

However, it is also important that I provide some general reflections on this year's discussions from the perspective of the Employer members of the Committee.

It was, we believe, a matter of regret that the Office reports and the texts proposed concentrated to such a large extent upon the experience of and prospects for developed countries in relation to part-time work. We believe that part-time work is also of importance and potential importance for many developing countries and should be dealt with in that light. If it is not so dealt with then the risk of inappropriate instruments being proposed and adopted is inevitably greatly increased. In addition, of course, instruments of limited relevance to most member States will have little prospect of extensive application. We hope that governments of developing countries will play a more substantial role in the second discussion and that their concerns will be more fully reflected in the results of that discussion.

I also wish to express the satisfaction of the Employer members of the Committee concerning the atmosphere in which the first discussion of this item took place. It was indeed a pleasure for us to work in this Committee and we appreciated the harmonious and constructive nature of the discussions. That this was possible, while dealing with a difficult and controversial issue, was largely due to the expertise and charm of our Chairman. Mr. Rood's skills, courtesy, tact and good humour guided us in the right direction throughout our work and we are extremely grateful to him.

We would also like to express our thanks to our Reporter, Mrs. Samuel, for her excellent work in connection with the preparation of the Committee's report. We are also grateful to the representative of the Secretary-General and the staff of the secretariat for their untiring and highly skilled work throughout our discussions.

Finally, I wish to express our thanks and my personal appreciation for the manner in which the Workers' Vice-Chairwoman approached and dealt with this year's discussions. Mrs. van de Burg pursued her objectives firmly, but not so firmly that agreement and understanding became impossible. Indeed, her willingness to understand points of view opposite to her own and to seek a resolution of differences where they existed made a very large contribution to the constructive nature of the discussions.

With the reservations I have expressed, I endorse this report and I support its adoption by the Conference.

Mrs. VAN DE BURG (Workers' member, Netherlands; Worker Vice-Chairwoman of the Committee on Part-time Work) – Is the standard-setting task of the ILO obsolete? Are the issues for initiating new universal labour Conventions and Recommendations exhausted? And do the global economic trends of structural adjustment, flexibility and deregularization detract from their importance or at most place it somewhere on the margin?

These were questions that weighed heavily on the Committee on Part-time Work at this session.

Employers wanted to make us believe that part-time work is just another phenomenon of employment expansion that should be promoted and applauded without major restrictions. Governments fear that offering part-workers the full protection that full-time workers enjoy in social security and other aspects of legislation and public provisions would, even on a proportionate and pro rata basis, generate costs and make the exploitation of part-time work less attractive for employers.

From the point of view of the Workers' group at this session of the Conference, part-time work should essentially be normal work, with all workers' rights and protection, where appropriate, granted on a pro rata basis in accordance with the number of hours worked. Part-time workers should not be inferior, second-class workers with a lower status or be deprived of the protection that has been built up by the labour movement and placed on record in international labour standards and national labour legislation. That is exactly why we included in the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation that part-time work should be available and accessible at all levels of the enterprise and in skilled jobs and managerial positions.

In some industrialized countries we can notice such a trend already. There people like you and me enjoying reasonable standards of living who can afford to work less time, redefining jobs so as to enlarge the chances of the jobless to find employment and thereby facilitating a more equal sharing of the work. But for most countries this road to a redivision of labour is a futuristic idea. Our colleagues are now confronted with part-time work as a new concept of labour exploitation, in which employers profit from the high productivity and a low costs of part-time labour. In these circumstances working part time is not a free choice but an unambiguously forced undertaking due to the lack of full-time and full-fledged job opportunities offering better income prospects. This is what from the workers' side has been the background for our approach to the discussion in the Committee on Part-time Work. We have continuously emphasized that part-time work should be freely chosen employment and not a passport to cheap labour, and although we recognize to our regret that not all the newly invented and introduced excesses of the cheap labour concept can be dealt with in these instruments, we are convinced that the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention and Recommendation on part-time work that have been drafted at this session will prove to be very useful.

In such an international labour standard the emphasis should of course be on the protection of part-time workers. In fact, that should have been so evident that separate standard setting should have been superfluous. If part-timers were treated fully equally to full-time workers all other international labour Conventions and Recommendations and all normal national laws and regulations would fully apply to them. In the preamble of the proposed instruments we refer to some of these international labour standards that are particularly relevant and in the first provision after the definition, we state that these new standards should not affect more favourable provisions granted under other Conventions. However, since reality shows that this equal treatment is not so evident as it should be, the Workers' group is fully convinced of the usefulness and necessity of a special instrument consisting of a Convention and a Recommendation, as outlined in the proposed conclusions. We fully support these conclusions and most of the proposed provisions.

As I said, our emphasis lay on protection measures. As is outlined in several parts of the proposed conclusions with a view to a Recommendation, part-time workers should have access to all the rights and protections that have been built up for full-time workers, comparable full-time workers, as the definition says, and this means, and this cannot be stressed too often, that the only difference of actual working hours does not make part-time workers a different type of worker who is not comparable with full-time workers in the same establishment. The proposed instrument provides in the opinion of the Workers' group the equal treatment that we find desirable, where appropriate with full protection or in other cases with rights which are proportional to the number of hours worked. Sometimes only equity is recommended, particularly with respect to provisions that are, I am sorry to say, not really common for workers in general.

On close examination I am convinced that the Proposed Conclusions give a balanced set of provisions for a universal modern and up-to-date widely applicable Convention to be further refined and polished at next year's session, and which will be adopted by unanimity or near unanimity, despite all comments and critical opinions in advance from the Employers' side.

I can assure you that we from the Workers' side will enter next year's discussions very determined with a view to the adoption of such a Convention and never mind the deletion of that expression in the final resolution of our committee, and the declaration of opposition from Mr. Noakes. We hope for a constructive and cooperative approach from the Employers' side as well. As we have said, this Convention should also be flexible and general enough for it to be ratified widely by as many member States as possible. The provisions for possible exceptions, guided and monitored by the ILO, and a general and flexible wording, make this reasonable and feasible.

The same applies to the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation. Something that still worries me with respect to this proposed Recommendation is the somewhat odd discussion that we had in the committee about the verb "apply" used with respect to the proposed Recommendation in its relation with the provisions of the proposed Convention. Although it was made unmistakably clear by the Legal Adviser that, for the application procedure, this wording did not make any difference, some Government members persisted in opposing the use of this word "apply", which is normal in other international labour Recommendations in the same context. I hope that their approval of the Legal Adviser's interpretation will last, as well as their intention to take the proposed Recommendation equally serious, whatever the wording at this particular point.

So, to finalize my remarks on the conclusions of the Committee on Part-time Work, the Workers' group looks forward to finishing the work on drawing up an adequate Convention and Recommendation on part-time work next year along the productive, fast and cooperative lines that we were able to develop this year. I would like to use this opportunity to thank and to compliment the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. M. Rood, for his excellent guidance, Mr. Noakes, on the Employers' side and the Office team headed by Mr. Dumont for their thorough preparation and hard work during the session. Once again I thank all participants from the three groups for their able contributions and for the constructive atmosphere of the proceedings.

Mr. ROOD (Government member, Netherlands, Chairman of the Committee on Part-time Work) – I would like to make three observations.

The first observation relates to the time before, the second to the time when, and the third to the time after, I was in the Chair of the Committee. Before coming to Geneva, I was warned by different sides that the Committee on Part-time Work was supposed to be very difficult, even terrible to chair. Primarily those warnings which you will understand were based on the highly controversial substance the Committee would have to deal with, and furthermore, with the strong views that Employers, Workers and Governments – the last ones particularly – in so far as part-time work instruments would influence statutory schemes on social security. Now looking back on our work these past three weeks, I confess to a not terrible but indeed rewarding and very interesting experience. You might wonder what made the difference between the expectations before and the experience after this. It seems to me there were three courses: first of all, the excellent work performed by the Secretariat, notably Messrs. Dumont and Thurman, in drafting Proposed Conclusions of a delicate and balanced nature; secondly, the very competent way in which the Secretariat provided further explanations during our examinations when called for; and thirdly, the attitudes existing on all sides to try to come to solutions somewhere in between and the absence of a tendency to stick to all viewpoints at all costs. In this respect, please allow me to extend my thanks to both Vice-Chairpersons, to the Reporter who made such an excellent report and indeed to all the members of the Committee who shared in that attitude.

Coming to my second observation, I recall the controversial nature of part-time work, bearing in mind issues such as it being chosen freely and its promotion. It is my impression that our achievement – overcoming the difficulties surrounding the definition of part-time work used in the proposed instruments – then set the trend for the climate of the Committee's discussions – a climate in which efforts were made to find solutions acceptable on different if not indeed all sides.

It may be of interest to you, from a political point of view, that we witnessed during our discussions, the birth of a second government bloc besides the EC bloc, that very interesting developments, judged from the political angle, even showed the new bloc to expand in a very short time to 13 nations spread all over the world. We got so accustomed to the spokesperson on behalf of those nations playing an important role in our discussions that the bloc, in committee language, was christened "the Caron bloc". We even saw a third bloc emerging, albeit a lone one, as the distinguished Government representative concerned referred to it himself, and which did not prevent him by the way, at some occasions admitting to the Committee that his opinions were divided.

Coming to my third observation on the work still before the Committee next year, I submit to you that in 1994 constructive discussions will be possible again whatever their outcome. One should, however, keep in mind – and you heard that a minute ago from the Employers' Vice-Chairman – that controversies on the subject still exist. Yet, I am concerned, as far as next year is concerned, on two grounds, the first one being that the Committee will be having two days less for its work to be done, which might influence the climate of its discussions unfavourably, and my second concern has to do with the working hours of delegates, secretariats and supporting services. This year already, people had to work until 4 and even 6 o'clock in the morning, preparing documents which had to be before the Committee a couple of hours later where they again had to be present. Frankly, when I return to my university I shall be unable to explain to my students how the ILO, existing for 74 years and having established its very first instrument on maximum working time, simply seems to be unable to apply those standards to its own personnel. There seems, I have found out, to exist an impression that this phenomenon cannot be changed. May I, however, in concluding, submit that such attitudes are detrimental to the example the ILO should give in this respect and to the personnel itself.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – I thank Mr. Rood for his excellent statement and for his comments on work at the ILO and the efforts of the ILO staff who stay very late to finish their work.

May I now submit the report for general discussion.

Mr. MOORHEAD (Employers' adviser and substitute delegate, United States) – We have before us the Report of the Committee on Part-time Work. I am addressing my comments in particular to the Government delegations because when we meet next year for the final discussion and adoption of our Report, it is the Governments who will strongly influence its structure and content. I urge those Governments who did not participate in the work of the Committee this year to review carefully the materials they receive this summer and the proposed part-time Convention and Recommendation, and to consider seriously whether your country's interests would be well served by ratifying the draft Convention. If your answer is no, I urge you to become actively involved in the Committee's work next year.

At the beginning of the Committee's work, 54 Governments had signed on as titular members. Two days later, a vote was taken as to whether or not we would have only a Recommendation without a Convention. The Governments were divided, and a Convention and Recommendation were narrowly approved with 47 Governments participating in the vote. By the end of our work, 76 Governments were signed up as titular members, which means that almost 30 Governments did not participate in this crucial vote, and, more significantly, almost one-half of the Governments present at the Conference did not participate in the Committee's work at all.

United States employers are concerned that, by seeking to establish a labour standard on part-time work, we are seeking to regulate something that will impede the economic development of all countries and stifle job creation. Little research has been done on the role of part-time work in job creation. We believe that part-time work plays a major role in job creation and economic development, especially in the so-called developing countries and the emerging market economies of central and eastern Europe. Some research, principally by the OECD, has been done on the structure of part-time work in OECD countries. It shows that part-time work has frequently been found to be voluntary, and prevalent among older workers. We know from other studies that part-time work is supposed to conform to individual circumstances, especially in developed countries with many women returning to the workforce. We know that in almost one-third of OECD countries, part-time employment, as a percentage of total employment, exceeds 20 per cent.

Practices which are harmful to part-time workers have not been identified so as to draw up a meaningful labour standard. Instead, the social philosophies of governments, particularly in the developed world, have been incorporated into the proposed Convention and Recommendation. For example, a representative of the Office during one of our tripartite Committee meetings said that we were trying to place part-time workers on the same footing as full-time workers with respect to benefits. Some enterprises, of course, do this voluntarily. However, the OECD, according to a recent newspaper report, has recently turned up other data suggesting that unemployment has become endemic in Europe, and that entrepreneurial activity is being stunted by the heavy costs to employers of the benefits they must provide to workers.

Ask yourself: "What would be the impact of the proposed Convention and Recommendation on job creation and economic development in my own country?" We see from another study that small and medium-sized businesses in the EC employ 70 per cent of the total workforce. The conclusion is clear: that the proposed Convention and Recommendation will create difficulties and discourage capital investment in precisely those businesses which employ the most people, create the most jobs, and are the engine of economic growth. Part-time work provides the small entrepreneur with a flexible workforce which is critical in the start-up phase of a business. These part-time jobs frequently lead to rewarding full-time employment.

United States employers draw the attention of member Governments, in particular to the provisions of the proposed Recommendation. The proposed Convention allows a Member to exclude from its scope particular categories of workers when its application to them would raise particular problems of a substantial nature. The proposed Recommendation carries no such provision and instead calls upon governments progressively to reduce threshold requirements, based upon earnings or hours of work, for participation in statutory social security schemes related to occupational activity. The proposed Recommendation provides, as far as possible, that changes in the work schedule of part-time workers should be subject to restrictions. Another Article completely ignores the structure of part-time work outside the EC countries.

Some governments, in our discussion in Committee about the proposed Recommendation, took the view that they were not particularly concerned with the content of the Recommendation, since it was not in any way binding upon them. This, I believe, is a naive and dangerous misconception. One should never underestimate the importance of a Recommendation when it accompanies a Convention. A Recommendation is used by the Committee of Experts as a basis for guidance as to how a Convention should be implemented in a ratifying country, and often is used by unions as evidence of best practice in national or sector-wide collective bargaining.

I therefore urge that the member Governments give careful consideration, firstly, to the current and future role of part-time work in the creation of jobs in each of your countries; and secondly, to whether or not your interests might not be better served by a Recommendation only, which, in addition to giving general guidance, would call for further research in this area. Above all, I hope that next year, governments will come prepared to participate in our work from the beginning, as every decision will be important.

Mr. STEYNE (Workers' adviser, United Kingdom) – It is my pleasure on behalf of the Trades Union

Congress, which represents over 8 million trade unionists in the United Kingdom, to support the adoption of the report of the Committee on Part-time Work.

Our discussions have shown that part-time work is increasing throughout the world and that the need for standards relating to this form of employment is not restricted to the industrialized countries alone. But it is true that working people in the United Kingdom and their trade unions have a particular interest in this issue. One quarter of the British workforce work part time – that is over 5 million workers, 90 per cent of whom are women.

The Committee on Part-time Work did not, I can assure you, work part time. But for most of us that was a free choice. On the other hand, as Professor Rood has said, I doubt whether all the ILO staff felt the same way. Part-time work, however, is often not freely chosen. For many, it is the only way to combine family responsibilities with the need to earn a living. For example, in the United Kingdom child care is totally inadequate and extremely poor compared to the services available to our colleagues in other States of the European Community. In many sectors part-time work is increasingly the only type of employment available, as employers, recognizing its greater profitability and flexibility, exploit and indeed help create a lack of full-time job opportunities.

Privatized companies have reorganized their workforces. In the United Kingdom, it would appear that this is in breach of EC law, as they are reducing hours and wages while increasing workloads. Retailers increasingly replace full-time staff with part-timers on split shifts, for example, employing them only four hours a day during the busy lunch-time and later afternoon periods, in order to maximize profits while minimizing costs. This permits them to meet peaks in demand and cut staff during quiet periods. It gives a new definition to the phrase "unsocial working hours". Part-time workers are concentrated in the services and public sectors, and most are in low-paid, low-status jobs. Only 11 per cent of part-time workers in the United Kingdom are in professional employment. The free choice of part-time work for the pleasure of increased leisure is a luxury which is not available to people with low levels of pay.

These trends mean that part-time work, which is already widespread, is spreading to new sectors, affecting increasing numbers of workers previously used to full-time employment and bringing into the part-time workforce more men than hitherto. We believe that there is an urgent need for greater protection for part-time workers and, above all, for them to enjoy the same individual and collective employment rights and conditions of employment as their full-time colleagues.

In the United Kingdom some 700,000 employees who work less than eight hours a week can never qualify for most employment rights however long they stay with their employer. We thus welcome the possibility of the progressive reduction of thresholds suggested in the report's conclusions.

In my own country the Government is just about to abolish the Wages Councils which, in the absence of a statutory minimum wage, set minimum hourly rates in certain industries. They protected many part-time workers. In this context, the need for improvements in their rights and conditions of employment becomes all the more apparent and all the more urgent. Deregulation has gone hand in hand not only with an increase in unemployment and poverty but also with the development of marginalized sectors of the workforce. At last, one after another, major economies are learning from the disastrous example set by the United Kingdom in the 1980s and turning away from the failed economic policies of the last decade.

It was noticeable in the generally cooperative atmosphere of our Committee that the governments of the European Community regularly spoke as a group but almost always with the exception of the Government of the United Kingdom. Now that it appears possible that the social chapter of the Maastricht Treaty may be ratified by our Government, we hope that next year we will be able to see a more positive attitude from it towards improving the lot of part-time workers – in my country one in four of the workers. There is indeed no reason why they should not amend their abysmal record of ratification since 1979 and ratify the instruments which we trust the Conference will adopt next year. I commend the report to the Conference.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – If there are no further speakers we shall now proceed to the adoption of the body of the report. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the body of the report, that is paragraphs 1 to 367, is adopted.

(The report is adopted, paragraphs 1 to 367.)

PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON PART-TIME WORK: ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We shall now proceed to the adoption of the Proposed Conclusions, Point by Point. May I consider that the Proposed Conclusions, Points 1 to 35, are adopted?

(The Proposed Conclusions are adopted.)

RESOLUTION TO PLACE ON THE AGENDA OF THE NEXT ORDINARY SESSION OF THE CONFERENCE AN ITEM ENTITLED "PART-TIME WORK": ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We shall now proceed to the adoption of the resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Part-time work".

If there are no objections, I shall consider this resolution adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We have now completed the consideration and adoption of the report, the Proposed Conclusions and the resolution submitted by the Committee on Part-time Work.

It remains only for me to express my gratitude to the Chairman, the Vice-Chairpersons, the Reporter, the members of the Committee and the secretariat for the very excellent work they have done.

FINAL RECORD VOTE ON THE CONVENTION CONCERNING THE PREVENTION OF MAJOR INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENTS

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – The next item on our agenda is the final record vote on the Convention concerning the prevention of major industrial accidents.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – The result of the vote on the Convention is as follows: 355 votes in favour, 5 against, with 23 abstentions. The quorum is 263. As the required two-thirds majority has been attained, the Convention concerning the prevention of major industrial accidents is adopted.

(The Convention is adopted.)

FINAL RECORD VOTE ON THE RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING THE PREVENTION OF MAJOR INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENTS

The PRESIDENT (Mr. TABANI) – We shall now proceed to the final record vote on the Recommendation concerning the prevention of major industrial accidents.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – The result of the vote on the Recommendation is as follows: 351 votes in favour, 4 against with 19 abstentions. The quorum is 263. As the required two-thirds majority has been attained, the Recommendation concerning the prevention of major industrial accidents is adopted.

(The Recommendation is adopted.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the next item of the agenda. On my own behalf and on behalf of the whole Conference I now have the honour to invite Mr. Michel Hansenne, Secretary-General of the Conference and Director-General of the ILO to reply to the discussion of his Report.

REPLY OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL TO THE DISCUSSION OF HIS REPORT

Original French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – As one more International Labour Conference draws to a close, I should first like to thank each and every delegate who has taken the floor during the discussion. In particular, I should like to thank and congratulate the delegates of the nine new member States of the ILO and to say what a great pleasure it is to welcome them into our ranks.

To judge by appearances, we have had a peaceful and productive Conference. Everyone has worked hard and contributed to the success of the proceedings, either in committee or in plenary. One hundred and twenty-five ministers attended the 1993 Session of the Conference, which bears witness to the continued interest in our work. However, apart from the very substantial and concrete results, I have noted a number of signals that have to be interpreted in order to provide us with food for thought.

One of the major decisions of this session of the Conference was the adoption of the Programme and Budget for the 1994-95 biennium. I should like to thank the vast majority who voted for the budget for their understanding and support, both as regards the general lines of emphasis – democratization, the fight against poverty, protection of workers – and as regards the various changes proposed, which were discussed at the Conference. I refer, for example, to the active partnership policy discussed in the Committee on Technical Cooperation.

Other reforms concern the organization of the Conference itself. The 80th Session, which the President and Vice-Presidents have steered with great effectiveness and courtesy, will be the last of its kind. You have adopted the Report of the Standing Orders Committee, and you have been informed of the discussions of the Governing Body. The amendments that you have adopted have made it possible to rationalize your activities, in particular the various reports submitted to the Conference on the Organization's activities and a spacing-out of the sessions of the Resolutions Committee.

Future Conferences will therefore be shorter and more economical, both for the Organization and for its member States. I trust that these reforms will solve the problem of delegations that are incomplete for financial reasons.

I should like to refer to the discussion that took place for the fourth year running at a special sitting on the annex to my report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories.

You reminded us that the key to the problem lies in the cessation of military occupation, referring, in many cases, to paragraph 148 of my report. The ILO's position has been the same since 1978: military occupation is incompatible with the free exercise of the civil and political freedoms that are indispensable for the application of the principles and standards that our Organization defends.

Concerns that are not new were expressed in your statements, for example the lack of social coverage for Palestinian workers, their working conditions, the harsh security measures to which they are subjected, especially in the Gaza Strip, not to mention the dependence of the Palestinian economy on the Israeli economy. But many of you have spoken of something new, namely the sealing-off of the occupied territories since 31 March this year when the cycle of violence reached its height. As a result, more than 100,000 workers were deprived of their livelihood. I hereby urgently appeal to the Israeli authorities to allow all Palestinian workers from the occupied territories who have been prevented from going to their jobs in Israel for the past three months to return to work.

This closure of the territories shows once again the need for internal development in the occupied territories. Investments must be made in the territories to provide jobs for Palestinians: the necessary labour can then be trained in the context of this development. I have noted the positive statements made on the subject of the Office's technical cooperation programme, and I repeat my commitment to intensify such action within the limits of our budget.

As in 1992, numerous speakers mentioned the desirability of having an ILO official on the spot in the occupied territories. I am still convinced that a permanent presence would only be useful if the Office were to play a role in the promotion of dialogue between the parties. I maintain my offer of good offices to start off this dialogue, the aim being to make some sort of contribution in the area of labour and to find solutions to the serious problems raised in my report.

At the beginning of this speech, I said that the Conference had, under peaceful appearances, emitted contradictory signals. This applies to the vote on the budget. As I said, it was adopted by a very large majority, but several Employers, among them many members of the Governing Body, abstained during the vote. This was doubtless not so much a negative vote as an expression of dissatisfaction at what they see as inappropriate responses by the ILO to current problems. Their point of view must be taken into consideration as part of the overall process of reflection on the Organization's future.

There are also lessons to be learned from the choice of the five resolutions referred to the Resolutions Committee for discussion. The fact that a resolution submitted by several Employers' delegates asking for a debate on the Organization's aims and means of action, was classified second and that another submitted by the ASEAN countries calling for more flexibility in our standard-setting activities came in fourth place obviously requires further reflection.

I think that there is a growing consensus in favour of continuing the reforms undertaken, although the actual content of the changes to be made is still a moot point.

These matters will be the subject of my report to the Conference next year, when we celebrate the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. My report will address all these apparently contradictory subjects.

Take, for example, the future of the Organization's standard-setting policy. Many stress its relevance in the present context and there are even some who wish to link it to other debates on trade and commerce taking place in GATT and other forums. Others, however, question the usefulness and relevance of our standard-setting instruments. But while, for example, the resolution proposed by the ASEAN countries calls for a more flexible approach to standard-setting work, I note, on the other hand, that a new Convention and a new Recommendation, with very substantial provisions, have been adopted this year and that a very broad consensus exists for the adoption of two further instruments next year. Standard-setting work thus continues to develop.

The proposed Convention and Recommendation on the prevention of major industrial accidents secured a broad consensus within the three groups on the Committee. The new standards aim at protecting workers, the public and the environment against the risks of such accidents. They provide for the identification and notification of high-risk installations through technical and organizational measures within the enterprise and through the establishment of emergency procedures.

No country, however rich, is safe from such accidents and no country, however poor, can leave its workers, its local communities and its population defenceless against the risk of such disasters. Whatever its other concerns, the ILO must give top priority to the safeguarding of workers' lives and health. International labour standards – applied with the help of codes and handbooks of practical guidelines, technical cooperation and appropriate measures for disseminating information – are essential for any ILO programme worth its salt on safety and health at work.

While the views and objectives of all the groups were the same concerning the drafting of effective standards for the prevention of industrial accidents, the drafting of labour standards for part-time work was on the other hand much more controversial.

Contrary to expectations, the Committee on this subject concluded its work in an excellent atmosphere and even achieved very positive results in view of a final discussion. It reached an agreement on a proposed Convention and a proposed Recommendation. They provide in particular that part-time workers should have similar or equivalent protection to that of full-time workers in a comparable situation as far as various important points are concerned, and that access to part-time work that is productive and freely chosen should be facilitated. It is my hope that next year these conclusions will be included in instruments that will provide useful solutions to our constituents, and in particular in a Convention significant in substance and sufficiently flexible to be broadly ratified.

I am delighted to note that in the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations the work was conducted in an excellent atmosphere. In particular, I would like to emphasize that the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, the Chairman of which was present at the Conference for the first time, expressed the desire to participate in the debate. I also note that the Conference Committee emphasized the danger of excessively burdening national administrations and also the need to avoid weakening the supervisory machinery as it is modernized.

Standards were also discussed by the Committee on Technical Cooperation, as was of course the link between standards and technical cooperation itself. Although views may have differed (and no one expected this to be otherwise), the principle of synergy between the two great means of action of the ILO was confirmed. Similarly, the establishment of multidisciplinary teams and, more generally, the policy of active partnership were encouraged.

I have also noted that the Committee was concerned that the new policy should not weaken the capacity of the technical departments and that direct assistance to employers' and workers' organizations should be maintained. It also insisted that the role of area offices should be well-defined, that the multidisciplinary nature of the teams should be genuine and that headquarters should maintain control over all the activities.

The Committee emphasized the importance, and I could not agree more, of a coherent ILO strategy for technical cooperation. It insisted that this strategy should clearly define priorities and establish the means of action and a realistic timetable for the attainment of these aims.

An effective technical cooperation programme should be devised and implemented at the country level. It should combine research aimed at policies, advisory services on general policies and the carrying out of projects. I welcome these conclusions. I also understand the request made to the Office that there should be an appropriate assessment system which would make it possible for the Governing Body to have a say in administrative activities which it feels are particularly important. All these recommendations go in the direction of the reforms that have been undertaken. I can only welcome them.

This new strategy will also be the subject of my report next year.

The conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, which the Conference approved unanimously this year, are both prudent and forward-looking.

They show a measured optimism as to the assessment of the negotiation process in South Africa. This process is marked by clear progress because an agreement has been reached on a possible date for the election of a constituent assembly in April 1994 and a Transitional Executive Council will probably be set up as early as next month. But it is also a fragile and unstable process because it can be compromised at any moment by the terrible turmoil which continues to plague all sectors of the South African population. That is why the Committee has requested that the machinery which has been set up by the ILO to combat apartheid, namely the Declaration and the Programme of Action against Apartheid, should remain in force until the election of a constituent assembly, and that the Governing Body next November should put the question of the reexamination of the Declaration on the agenda of the Conference in 1994 if by that time the progress towards democracy justifies its inclusion.

What I myself would like to emphasize is that these conclusions underscore the tremendous task which the ILO will have to face if it wishes, when the time comes, to assist South Africa to take its place once again in the community of nations and to overcome all the social and economic consequences of decades of apartheid. The conclusions ask me to draw up a plan of action covering practically all the fields where the ILO is competent to provide technical assistance which the Office will provide to South Africa once a Transitional Executive Council has been set up. I intend to take up this task without any delay so that the ILO will be able to meet the expectations of the people of South Africa when this becomes necessary.

The discussions which took place in the plenary and concerning the resolution which was adopted by the Resolutions Committee concentrated on one and the same question: Should we choose, and how, between employment and social protection or, as Mr. Reich, the Secretary of Labor of the United States, has said, between inequality and job creation? To a certain extent this is the same old debate about whether economic or social considerations should come first, but in this case there are two basic questions: Is the ILO able to express itself clearly on these problems and contradictions now shaking our planet? Can it make its voice heard in a world where there is an increasing din of messages of all sorts?

Allow me briefly to refer to the discussion in the plenary and to try to draw a few lessons from it.

Social protection is an extremely urgent question in practically all the countries of the world. As regards the developing countries, all the speakers, one after the other, confirmed the bleak picture painted in my Report. In these countries only a slight fraction of the population benefits from the existing social security schemes and, furthermore, many of these systems are beleaguered by problems of the worst sort. There is no denying that heavy job losses and plummeting workers' remuneration are the main factors which have undermined the balance of social security funds, particularly in Africa. However, many Employers' and Workers' delegates also pointed out that the State too often tends to borrow money from these funds at artificially low interest rates and that this money is not put to good use in a number of countries.

As was pointed out, women are often in a very unfavourable situation as regards social protection.

This is something that was of course mentioned in my report and will be dealt with in greater detail at the tripartite meeting which is to take place next year on this subject.

Many speakers refer to the social distress which has resulted from structural adjustment programmes. Mr. Ellah, the Secretary for Labour and Productivity of Nigeria, expressed a severe warning in this connection. He said "there is a grave danger of serious social unrest unless we are able to take adequate measures towards effective social insurance and protection in aid of the silent majority of our country's men and women ...".

As regards the industrialized countries, some of you, for instance Mr. Oechslin, Employers' delegate of France, or Mr. Edström, Workers' delegate of Sweden, felt that my report was too optimistic. In these countries social protection is of course not comparable with what one can find in the developing world. Nevertheless, in spite of all this, for some years now the situation has been deteriorating in this field in many respects and this very often at the expense of the most vulnerable groups of the population.

Some of you who represent the countries in transition towards a market economy have frankly evaluated the difficulties with which they are confronted. We all know that the stake is tremendously high because, to repeat what Mr. Ory, Workers' delegate of Hungary, has said, a certain number of people "are thinking nostalgically about a time when care, modest but accessible, was available and taken for granted practically for everyone and a pension, even if inadequate, was guaranteed and there was no talk of unemployment". If we want democracy to prosper in these countries and if we want to ensure a smooth economic transformation, it is vital that social protection should be strengthened. This is undoubtedly an area in which the State must continue to assume the chief responsibility.

You have also stressed the crucial role which the social partners can play in the preparation of reforms and in the management of social security schemes. It is comforting to learn that, in one way or another, tripartism contributes to the strengthening of social protection in countries as different as Bulgaria, Chile, the Dominican Republic, Greece, Indonesia, Malta, Slovenia or the Czech Republic. As some of the comments made by governments. Employers' and Workers' delegations, particularly from Latin America have shown, controversy is not always avoided. In such cases the role of the ILO must be to clarify technical questions and the different possible options in order to help all its constituents; I hope that the next regional meeting of experts for the Americas will contribute to this. It is clear that the Office duly appreciates the contributions of employers' and workers' organizations in this field as in others; it is ready to work with them and with the governments to achieve the ILO's objectives in the field of social protection.

Many of you spoke of the relationship between economic growth and social protection, but it is clear that views differ considerably on this subject. Only one thing is certain: for a given GDP, some countries devote much greater resources than other to social protection. There is therefore no direct relationship with these two elements. Other factors, such as the degree of solidarity within a nation and the political will to translate that solidarity into facts obviously play a capital role. But there is no doubt also that growth makes things much easier.

In many of your speeches you emphasized the role of labour market policy.

As Mr. Gontcharik, Workers' delegate of Belarus, said, the maintenance of employment and the creation of new jobs are essential conditions for social protection. Naturally, it is also crucial to develop employment in order to re-establish the financial balance of social security funds and guarantee the necessary fiscal resources to the State.

Several Employers' delegates expressed concern about the level of social security contributions and, in particular, their prejudicial effect on costs and international competitivity and consequently on unemployment. Undoubtedly, this does cause real problems, but we must not lose sight of certain important facts. The cost of labour is only one of the factors on which international competitivity depends and very often it is not the most significant. On the other hand, we do entirely agree that we have to reduce as far as possible the adverse effects that this or that method of financing social protection can have on employment.

We must take into consideration not only the volume of employment but also the type of employment and, in particular, non-standard employment contracts and the considerable increase in the number of self-employed workers who are in fact wage-earners. These practices seem to be gaining ground and are going to be unfair competition for the majority of employers who pay their social security contributions for their staff. I do not need to say as well that this also aggravates the financial problems of social security schemes.

As many of you have emphasized, the State must also help people to help themselves, be it through employment promotion and training or by facilitating the development of self-employment. The form and structure of social protection play an important role in guaranteeing or not guaranteeing the necessary encouragement in this direction. For instance, if in a country benefits are very often subject to a resource criteria, this is liable to discourage work and savings. Social insurances do not have this drawback, they encourage workers to work and to increase their rights to benefits. Thus, in certain respects, it is too simplistic to oppose individual responsibility and collective responsibility. Well thought-out collective machinery – and that is true for social insurance systems – also encourage individual responsibility. However, it does not prevent social security from playing a positive and even indispensable role, but it must not serve as a "spare wheel", as it were, in cases where it is impossible to provide adequate social security coverage. That is all for the discussion in plenary.

In parallel, the Resolutions Committee proposed, and the Conference adopted, a resolution concerning social protection and the alleviation of unemployment and poverty, and the social dimension of structural adjustment and transition to a market economy. As its title reveals, this is a very full resolution whose importance for our future activities and above all for very many citizens in very many countries I do not need to emphasize. It also echoes the Report that I submitted to this session of the Conference.

Moreover, it echoes the speech made by His Excellency Mr. Carlos Menem, guest of honour of the Conference, when he stressed that for his region – and I think it is valid for all regions – to continue to experience democracy and for its inhabitants to enjoy fully the rights and fundamental liberties of man, it was necessary for national economies to enter a process of globalization.

He added that this process would have to take place in conditions of equity and according to rules which were the same for all.

The resolution, and I am very happy about this, indicates a certain number of lines of future action for the Organization itself and also for it to be better received and understood by other international bodies and by the general public.

The resolution thus asks me to ensure that the problems of poverty, exclusion and unemployment and the need to encourage job creation, access to employment and the social protection of underprivileged groups are given due priority in the preparation with the Second High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment.

The resolution also specifically refers to the 1995 World Summit For Social Development and invites our constituents to continue to promote tripartite cooperation in that Summit and in all other appropriate forums. The resolution invites me to take the necessary measures to ensure the essential contribution of the ILO, through its tripartite structure, in the preparation, convening and follow-up of this Summit. I can assure you that this will be done and that we will put the desired stress on questions that are within the competence of the ILO, such as alleviation of poverty and the promotion of productive and freely chosen employment, social protection and freedom of association.

There is no doubt, as the Employers and many other delegates have said, that the crucial problem of social policy today is employment. That the ILO must concentrate more closely on problems of employment and unemployment has been a recurring theme in your discussions. The Organization has for years been working on questions of employment and continues to do so. These are questions that in fact take the largest share of our resources, at headquarters as in the regions. But I am very ready to agree that we have to give a clearer direction to our work and I intend to carry out many of our activities with this in mind, particularly in the context of the two important meetings that I have just mentioned.

As we prepare for them, and more importantly, as we mould the future role of the ILO, it is vital that we should go beyond generalities and solemn declarations. None of us is without concern, commitment, and the desire to act to promote employment. But more specifically, what exactly can the Organization do properly and credibly to help its constituents deal with employment problems? The questions are complex and difficult, the means limited and uncertain. No declaration of intent, no simple formula, no solemn debate forgotten tomorrow, will provide a credible answer.

The contradictions that I have just referred to are not unique to our Organization or even to the family of international organizations. They are inherent in the very process of development that we are seeing today. But it is extremely important that the ILO should overcome these obstacles and find the best possible synthesis, even if that synthesis can and must itself evolve in time and space.

I firmly believe that the work of the Office and the deliberations of its tripartite bodies will in future have to be directed in such a way that the Organization can provide, regularly and on a tripartite basis, clear and judicious opinions in reply to all the questions which arise in the economic and social field and which are also within the competence of other international organizations.

But it is essential that the response of the Organization should be its own unique response, if it is to continue in its role as the social conscience of the international system.

This is fundamental if we want to respond to demand, expressed in the resolution which has been adopted, to develop close cooperation with the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, the regional banks for reconstruction and development, and other international financial institutions. In this dialogue and debate, it is not a question of copying other agencies, or following them blindly. Nor is it a question of systematically opposing them. It is a question of asserting that we are different.

It is an awesome challenge, but our work this year has convinced me that we are well equipped to take it up.

The ILO is now in the year of its 75th anniversary, and determined to carry out reforms and renewal. Our organization has shown the way towards a revision of its hallowed practices, to adapt them to present-day needs.

Our main decision-making bodies – the Conference, the regional conferences and the Governing Body – have, with impressive single-mindedness, studied their own working methods, with a view to improving their efficiency and cost-effectiveness. The resulting savings have allowed us to undertake another significant reform, namely, a substantial transfer of resources for administrative tasks at headquarters to the consultative technical services in the regions.

The development of a policy of active partnership, and the strengthening of our strategies in the field thanks to the multidisciplinary teams who support this policy, will give our technical cooperation programme greater consistency, greater timeliness, and make it more responsive to the needs of our tripartite constituents. In the coming months, the sectoral activities of the ILO and the procedures and mechanisms for monitoring the application of standards, will be reviewed; other reforms are also on the agenda.

But however important these reforms are, and they certainly are important, they basically concern our methods and procedures.

Should we – and can we – go further? That is for you to decide. The discussions of this session of the Conference, and the many discussions which preceded them have shown clearly that our constituents have the will – indeed, they are eager – to ask a certain number of fundamental questions.

Are the ILO's objectives, and the methods it uses to achieve them, as relevant today as they were in the past?

Has the time come to redefine the objectives of the Organization, and to redefine our priorities?

In which direction should the standard-setting policies of the ILO develop?

How can we improve the efficiency of the technical services offered by the ILO to its constituents? What role can the ILO play in influencing economic policies to promote employment and social protection?

In my Report to the 81st Session of the Conference, which marks the anniversary of our Organization, I have the daunting honour of sharing with you my own ideas on these questions. But it is for you, the members of the Organization in your tripartite delegations, to find the proper balance between experience and innovation.

For an organization to open up a debate on its basic principles is the best sign of its vitality.

I am looking forward to this debate, as I am sure you all are, and I do so with all the pride that we draw from our Organization's past and from our faith in its future.

CLOSING SPEECHES

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – On behalf of you all I would like to thank the Director-General for his speech which touched upon all the work done by this session of the Conference, and the decisions taken and resolutions made by the committees. I should like once again, on behalf of you all and of myself, to thank the Director-General most warmly.

I should like now to proceed to the closing speeches of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like to ask the speakers to come to the rostrum. They will include Mr. Badey, Government delegate, Belarus, Mr. Tabani, Employers' delegate, Pakistan, and Mr. Gray, Workers' delegate, United States.

Original Russian: Mr. BADEY (Government delegate, Belarus, Vice-President of the Conference) – First of all may I express my deep gratitude for the honour bestowed upon me in terms of my election to the post of Vice-President of the Conference. I take this as a sign of the respect for my country, the Republic of Belarus, which has embarked upon the path towards democracy. The 80th Session of the Conference adopted very important documents and once again showed its strength and the wisdom of the International Labour Organization. It presented the world with new instruments for resolving social and economic problems. The delegation of Belarus supported the adoption of all the documents before the Conference, including the budget and its implementation. We only voted against the level of contributions expected from Belarus, which, set at 0.48, is an unreasonable figure for a country which is going through a harsh economic crisis and suffering the after-effects of the disaster at Chernobyl.

On the whole, both myself and my delegation are satisfied with the results of the Conference, and we would like to mention the tremendous amount of work carried out by the Secretariat of the International Labour Office, and the successful way in which they supported our activities.

I would like to express our gratitude to our colleagues in the Secretariat and wish them every success in their work in the future.

I would also like to express my deep gratitude to the President and all the participants of the Conference for the results that we achieved, and I wish them every success in strengthening peace and social and economic progress.

Mr. TABANI (Employers' delegate, Pakistan; Vice-President of the Conference) – I will first address to the President my congratulations on the manner in which he has conducted this session of the Conference. It has been a personal privilege for me to work with my Vice-President colleagues under his leadership. This honour, which I acknowledge with thanks, was bestowed on me by the Employers' group which allowed me to take part in this session at his side. It is also a recognition of Pakistan employers whom I represent at this session.

Normally the President is admired for the firmness with which he maintains discipline and schedule. But you, Sir, have taught us something that is more appropriate to this building and this session, where you have presided for the past three weeks. By your soft manners, amiable tone and minimum use of the gavel, you have shown that by dialogue, understanding and accommodation the world can avoid the bloodshed and fighting which have engulfed several parts of our globe today.

My cordial thanks to the Vice-Presidents for their cooperation throughout this session. May I also take this opportunity to thank the Director-General and his whole team – those visible and others who we did not see – for their devoted services and without whose efficiency this session would not have moved like the clock as it did. Two more unusual acknowledgements are also due. For the first time, transport arrangements were made for those delegates who wished to attend Friday prayers at the Mosque. I hope this welcome arrangement will be continued at future sessions.

The second is an established tradition, namely the sightseeing trips arranged by Mrs. Hansenne for the ladies accompanying delegates to the session. I wish to thank Mrs. Hansenne and her team of Protocol Officers who have brought so much pleasure to our ladies.

The session next year will be a special one, as the Director-General just said. It will mark the 75th anniversary of the founding of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. It will be a moment to celebrate the past and to take pride in the considerable achievements of our Organization. But, more importantly, it will be an opportunity to look forward towards the future and to think about the role of the ILO, its mission and its priorities at the turn of the century and beyond. Next year we must make a common effort, each contributing from his or her own perspective, to chart the future course of the Organization, to give it a continuing and renewed relevance in the light of a changed world. Despite our differences, we have made a success of the ILO in the past because we have worked together in the spirit of tripartism. I believe we can continue to do so in the future also.

The Governing Body and the Director-General have already started the process of review and reform. They have made changes in regional conferences and in the working of the Governing Body itself. We have at this session endorsed their proposals for improvements in the working of the Conference. Over the past few years, we have improved the budgetary regime of the Organization by adopting the Swiss franc contribution system, the forward-purchasing of dollars, the incentive scheme for early payments and changes in the Working Capital Fund.

All these changes must remain constantly under review, and suggestions for further improvements must always be considered. We must now also look more fundamentally beyond structures and procedures, towards the true mission of the ILO. We must review how it goes about achieving the objectives which its founders laid out for it in 1919, objectives which its constituents restated in 1944. We must look at how the ILO helps its Members to deal with their problems in the social and labour field, and we must see if it can be done better in the years to come.

The world around us is changing, and today the picture it makes is dismal. There are still too many people living below poverty levels. Much of the social tension that lends itself to political manipulation and violence can be ascribed to that poverty. Developing countries are not developing quickly enough, and the developed ones are in recession. The solution to most of these problems is one that is universally recognized, one that has displaced much else on the front pages of the newspapers around the world. The solution is employment. There is a crying need for international cooperation and action to help countries solve their problems in this areas, and that clearly should be the most fundamental mission of the ILO. There is no other international organization better placed to play this role than the ILO, and its greatest challenge in the years to come will be to deal with underdevelopment, and in particular rural poverty.

The standard-setting committees worked satisfactorily this year. We have been giving a lot of time and attention to standard-setting, as it is an important part of ILO activities. However, we must admit that ratification has consistently been slow, especially with respect to the standards adopted during the past several years, in particular the more technically detailed ones. We must consider this situation dispassionately, and pay much more attention to the choice of subjects on which we set standards, as well as the way in which we draft the texts. Unless instruments are drafted for universal application, they will not be universally applied. However attractive the highest standards might appear from a theoretical or moral perspective, we should be realistic in our goals. Otherwise, ratification will continue to be slow, and application even slower. The objectives will be too remote to be worth striving for.

While we were not satisfied with certain aspects of the conclusions of the discussion of technical cooperation, for the Employers' group technical cooperation is one of the most vital activities in the ILO. It is something for which we have always given our most enthusiastic support. We are quite attracted by the concept of multidisciplinary teams and look forward to seeing them contribute to the ILO's efforts in helping its Members solve their problems, especially in employment generation. Rural development and small enterprise development should figure high in this respect. Almost 70 per cent of the population in the Asian region consists of the rural poor who need to become the focus of attention of the ILO. There is a growing feeling in our countries that the ILO has done so much for the urban industrial worker at the cost of the teeming millions in the rural areas who are unemployed and underemployed. This neglect of the rural workers should end and the ILO must now divert its attention and resources to the promotion of employment in the rural areas.

We compliment the Director-General on his re-election for a second term of office and look forward to a continuation of his efforts to bring about reform and structural change in the ILO. We expect that he will not only maintain the technical level of expertise of the staff but will improve it both in Geneva and in the regions. He will have the fullest cooperation of the Employers, who recently made concrete proposals and suggestions for the reform of the ILO. As I mentioned earlier, and as the Director-General has also said so, we have a rendezvous next year to discuss the future of the ILO and we look forward to the contributions and suggestions of our Government and Worker colleagues on that occasion.

My country, Pakistan, was founded in 1947. I call it an infant country because we are still struggling to find our bearings as a democratic State and striving to establish an economic base to bring prosperity to our people. If Switzerland, as the Employers' Vice-President, Mr. Décosterd said last year, with a population of 6.9 million took 700 years to really establish democracy, then Pakistan is indeed, with a population of 110 million, an infant.

But we are proud of our cultural heritage, traditions and social customs. We enjoy the basic fruit of democracy, that is, human dignity. There are other countries which are less fortunate. They look up as we do to the ILO for guidance, assistance and understanding. They have very high hopes from the ILO because of its unique tripartite character. I sincerely hope that they will derive some benefit from the conclusions of this session. Let us all pledge to rededicate ourselves to the promotion of the objectives of this unique Organization, particularly at a time when we look forward to the 75th anniversary of its founding.

I wish all of you bon voyage and a safe journey back to your homes.

Mr. GRAY (Workers' delegate, United States; Vice-President of the Conference) – On behalf of the Workers' group, which I am deeply honoured to represent, and of my colleague, Manuel Bustos Huerta, whom I have replaced as Vice-President for the latter part of this Conference, and in my own name as a part-time Vice-President – a position for which, I might add for the Employers' benefit, I receive full benefits and entitlements – I wish to begin by expressing to you, Mr. President, our congratulations and our sincere thanks for the manner in which you have guided this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. Our business has proceeded smoothly, our timetable has been maintained and the reports that we have adopted are a testimony to the fruitfulness of the work that is being done.

In the established traditions and true spirit of the ILO, delegates have come to Geneva holding widely divergent views on the important matters that were before us. Through dialogue, negotiation and compromise, they now leave, having come together in consensus on each one of them.

If this happy result is in large measure due to a common commitment to tripartism, it is also the result of the skill with which our President and the various committee Chairpersons carried out their often burdensome tasks. Thanks are also due to my fellow Conference Vice-Presidents, Mr. Badey and Mr. Tabani, whose cooperation and teamwork made my own tasks enjoyable and that much easier.

This session of the Conference has provided a concrete demonstration of the continuing necessity and validity of the ILO's standard-setting and supervisory functions. The newly adopted Convention on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents is an admirable addition to the existing body of international labour standards. It addresses an issue of great and self-evident importance. It is eminently ratifiable and deserves to be widely ratified.

In addition, the signs are that the work done this year on part-time work has gone a long way towards ensuring the adoption of further instruments next year. Here, too, the subject-matter is of urgent concern, and whatever views one may hold concerning the growth of part-time employment, the appropriate role of the ILO must surely be to promote adequate protection of a workforce that too frequently endures inferior terms and conditions and exclusion from benefit entitlements.

Proper supervision of standards is the indispensable complement to adoption and ratification and, once more, the Committee of Experts and the Committee on the Application of Standards have risen admirably to their task. I wish again to place on record the Workers' group's full support for the authority of the experts and for the established supervisory machinery. Without them, the ILO simply would be unable to fulfil its mandate.

It is worth repeating that the objective of the ILO in the field of standards supervision is not to catch governments in the commission of violations, but rather to assist them in bringing their law and practice into conformity with their obligations. It is in this context that technical cooperation is a vitally important means of ILO action. The link between such cooperation and standards has been much discussed by the Governing Body, and the general debate at this Conference will, I am sure, have served to give further guidance to the Office on the real meaning of this link. It will therefore be of great assistance to the newly hatched Governing Body Committee on Technical Cooperation.

The momentous events in South Africa give cause both for optimism and for deep concern. Against this background of hope and uncertainty, the Conference Committee on Apartheid has shown its continuing commitment to a struggle that we all want to believe is nearing its end. In so doing, it has put the ILO in a position to respond readily and appropriately to developments, while making sure that it walks every inch of the last mile towards the establishment of a free, democratic, non-racist South Africa.

Finally, a few words concerning a committee that is very close to my heart – the Resolutions Committee. This year it gave us only one resolution. We have done better in the past, but we have also done worse. In any case, the resolution is a good one and the Committee is to be congratulated on it.

We leave the Conference today, and when we gather again next year it will be on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO. Our tasks then will include reflecting on how our Organization can best continue to fulfil its mandate of improving the conditions of working people throughout the world. It is not over-presumptuous to suggest that what we have done and achieved together at this session provides important pointers for the future. Each of us would do well to reflect on them over the year ahead.

I wish you all a safe journey back to your homes.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – Today the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference draws to a close, after working together for 20 days in such an interesting and continuous manner.

I, of course, shall not try and sum up what happened during the Conference because the speech by Mr. Michel Hansenne in reply to the different speakers was comprehensive and detailed. But, before leaving, I would like to mention a number of important questions that have been raised during the discussion, and I would like to share with you some ideas for the future.

It has often been said that the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference has been uneventful. Some people went as far as to explain this by the fact that the ILO had become less important today. Obviously, that is not my opinion. It is perfectly natural that confrontation and conflict die down as a result of the end of the Cold War and the move towards peace in the Middle East, and also because of the steps taken towards the establishment of a post-racist society in South Africa.

These changes should reduce sterile confrontation, and allow us to find a broader consensus on the questions to which we attach considerable importance in this little village that the world has become today.

This does not mean that this session of the Conference was not productive. We have moved from confrontation to implementation, and the demonstration of this is that this Conference had 285 speakers, representing Workers, Employers and Governments, including 125 ministers. Therefore, have we not every reason to be proud of this Conference, which has acted as a sort of international labour parliament?

The Director-General's Report, Social insurance and social protection, dealt with one of the most important subjects before us, above all, at a time of growing unemployment, both in industrialized and developing countries, and when adequate social protection is needed in developing countries and those that are in transition towards a market economy. The importance of this subject is underlined by the fact that the only resolution produced by this Conference was that "concerning social protection and the alleviation of unemployment and poverty, and the social dimension of structural adjustment and transition to a market economy". That resolution, as we can see in paragraph 2, draws up a future plan of action for this Organization so that it can combat poverty, unemployment and alienation.

I followed the serious and in-depth discussions that took place in the different committees. As an example I would like to mention the work of the Committee on Technical Cooperation and the decisions that Committee adopted, including that "technical cooperation should remain a major means of action for the attainment of the objectives of the ILO". This is in response to the demands of member States, particularly developing countries. The choice of the three subjects, the transition to democracy, the creation of employment and the protection of workers, also provide a reply and response to the demands of our time.On this occasion I should like to associate myself with the content of paragraph 45 of that Committee's report, concerning support for policy of active participation advocated by the Director-General and the need for strengthening that policy at the national level.

In addition to the technical items, our Conference examined two vitally important subjects, namely: the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, and the problem of apartheid in South Africa. The Director-General's Reports on these two subjects led to a rational and constructive dialogue.

The special sitting concerning the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, during which 51 speakers took the floor, was the best proof that a rapprochement has got under way between the parties concerned. The Director-General's Report showed us the road to be taken in the future – a road consisting of two parallel tracks. The first is outlined in paragraph 148, which says that a solution is linked to ending the military occupation. The second, reflected in paragraph 161, is based on the assumption that the time has come for additional measures to establish a direct dialogue between the parties in order to achieve peace.

I would like to support Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General, who for a second year running has asked us to make our Organization an appropriate rostrum for such a dialogue.

As regards the Committee on Apartheid, the role of the ILO is very clear. Our Organization is in a unique position to provide help in setting up a post-racial society. I fully support what is in paragraph 17 of the Committee's report regarding the need for an integrated programme of technical assistance in South Africa, based on the principles of job creation and respect for human dignity.

I fear that I have neglected some important aspects of this Conference, but my main objective was to emphasize our main achievements. When we speak of the present, we must not forget our vision of the future. At the opening of this session, I spoke with the future in mind, and I would like to reiterate the question I asked at the beginning of the Conference, which is this: what is the role of the ILO on the eve of the twenty-first century?

We have no choice but to find our true selves in a constantly changing world. I mentioned four challenges that we have to face today.

Firstly, we must put an end to the economic recession; secondly, we must aim to establish a global approach in response to change; thirdly, we must develop structural reform programmes which promote growth and social justice; fourthly, we must achieve a balance between the role of the state, market mechanisms and society as a whole represented by its different democratic bodies.

If we look at these challenges, we will realize that the role of this Organization is more important than ever. The ILO must choose its areas of activity carefully, and carry out its work with exemplary competence. If this Organization is to play a major role, then its three main tasks are, I submit, the following: firstly, we must formulate policies to achieve economic growth, create jobs and reduce unemployment.

Secondly, we must formulate policies to promote the overall trend towards democracy, respect for human rights and societies where growth and justice prevail. Thirdly, we have to draw up policies for the social protection of all, and particularly for the most disadvantaged parts of society.

The Organization is about to embark upon a new phase of its history. The reform activities which began with the policy of active participation where a positive reaction to the challenges to which I have just referred. We need to work out an active strategy in order to strengthen the role of the ILO as it celebrates its 75th year. I therefore would hope that the 1994-95 budget will be the last one prepared on the basis of zero growth. We cannot ask the Organization to play the role of a pioneer unless we give it the necessary resources to do so.

In conclusion I would like to express my thanks to all those who have helped make this session of the Conference a success. Of course, time does not permit me to name all those who participated in that success. But I would just like to thank the President's assistants, Mr. Tabani, Mr. Gray, Mr. Badey, Mr. Bustos Huerta, and the Clerk, Madame de Warlincourt. I would also like to thank all the chairmen, vice-chairmen and reporters of the different committees.

Finally, I would like to pay tribute to the outgoing members of the Governing Body and its Chairman, Mr. Vargas Campos, and I congratulate the new members of the Governing Body.

On behalf of all of us, I would like to thank the silent legions working behind the scenes who contribute to the proper operation of this Conference, the translators, the interpreters, the secretariat and those responsible for publications and the provisional records.

I would also like to thank my friend Mr. Michel Hansenne, whom you have chosen to lead the Organization in the years to come. I would like to wish him full success in carrying out this task.

I thank all of you and I wish you a good trip home to your respective countries. May the grace of God and His mercy be with you always.

Original French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – Mr. President, it is traditionally my duty to convey to you, on behalf of your officers and on behalf of all the delegates attending this Conference, our gratitude for the work that you have done during these past three weeks. Tradition also requires that, symbolically, this gratitude should take the form of a gavel, which represents the authority with which you conducted the proceedings. This year, I really feel that it is a highly inappropriate symbol, given the way in which you performed your task. I think you never once actually used the gavel before you. You were at all times calm and unruffled. Together with your Vice-Presidents, you ensured by careful attentiveness in the wings that our discussions took place in an atmosphere of serenity and equanimity. I have no other symbol to offer, but I remember a line by a French poet and playwright, who says in one of his plays: "It's much nicer when it's useless." And so I hope you will consider this gavel as a very fine object because it has been so useless during your presidency and must therefore be quite exquisite. You should take it that its very uselessness is the highest tribute that we can pay to your conduct of our proceedings for the past three weeks. Once again, Mr. President, thank you.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – These are the last minutes of the Conference. I hope we all meet again next year and now I declare this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference closed.

(The Conference closed sine die at 1 p.m.)

Corrigenda

No.	Page
6	6	Left-hand column, under "Workers' group", Mr. Kebe (Guinea) should be included among the Members of the Bureau.
7	1	Right-hand column. The speaker's name should read: Mr. ZUALA (Government adviser and subsitute delegate, India; etc.).
	8	Left-hand column, top lines. The sentence should end: "... and the 10 per cent lowest was 4.5 or 5:1, while now it has reached 20:1".
10	24	Right-hand column, top line. The speaker's name should read: Mr. SEMICHI (accompanying the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Algeria).
11	5	Right-hand column, second full paragraph, sixth line. For "restrictive economy" read "planned economy".
	11	Left-hand column, fourth paragraph from end of page. The sentence should begin: "Our social policy concept...". Right-hand column, fourth paragraph. The first sentence should end: "...those citizens who are unable to ensure the basic means of subsistence through their own endeavours". At the end of the sixth paragraph, add the following sentence: "Finally, let me express the Government's determination to ensure the successful continuation of economic transformation."
12	1	Right-hand column. In the list of Employers' deputy members the 12th name should read as follows: Mr. de Regil (Mexico).
	2	Left-hand column. In the list of Workers' deputy members, the sixth name should read as follows: Mr. Klochkov (Russian Federation).
	8	Right-hand column. The speaker's name should read: "Mr. MOUSHOUTTAS". In the third paragraph of Mr. Moushouttas' speech, delete the word "fully" in the fourth line. In the last paragraph on page 8, for "fifteenth century" read "fifth century".
	9	Left-hand column, sixth full paragraph, third line, for "single-rate" read "flat-rate".
13	13	Left-hand column. The speaker's name should read: Mr. DESSER (Government adviser, Austria).
	16	Right-hand column, third full paragraph. In the second line the word "a" should be deleted.
	17	Left-hand column. In lines 3 to 5 the sentence should read: "... a permanent Conference committee on this matter would be intolerable to my Government".
	19	Left-hand column, speech by Mr. ZELLHOEFER (Workers' adviser and substitute delegate, United States). In the first paragraph, line 8, insert "greater" before "optimism". Second paragraph, the third sentence should begin "The Histadrut committee for the workers from the territories...". The last sentence should begin "The combined data..." and end "... having been opened, 250 applications for legal advice, and 3,157 complaints being handled". Right-hand column, first full paragraph, line 5 should begin "necessary security measures". Fourth full paragraph, line 13, delete the word "either".
	22	Left-hand column. The speaker's name (Mr. TIZMAGHZ) should be preceded by "Original Farsi".
	25	Both columns. Mr. GHETASSI's name should be preceded by "Original Arabic".
	33	The statement by Mr. Aly Khalil, Minister of Social Affairs and Labour of the Syrian Arab Republic, exercising his right of reply on behalf of the Arab Group, should read as follows: "I asked for the floor to exercise the right of reply to what was said by the Government delegate and the Workers' delegate of the United States concerning the reasons which led the Arab Group not to have recourse to the supervisory bodies, in other words to the ILO's usual supervisory machinery, to defend the interests of Palestinian workers and those of other Arab

13 33 workers in the other occupied Arab territories. My reply is that the Arab Group is not unaware of, does not pretend to be unaware of, and does not transgress this machinery, but respects and abides by its rules. The reasons for not having recourse to this machinery can be summarized as follows:

1. The examination of the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories is, at present, carried out directly, for fundamental objective reasons, by the International Labour Office in accordance with article 10 of the Organization's Constitution, and pursuant to two resolutions adopted by the Conference in 1974 and 1980, with which you are familiar and whose application is incumbent on every member State of this Organization. That is why we believe that recourse to the supervisory machinery would mean that we are disregarding the Conference resolutions, leading to a kind of duplication and contradiction in the methods of work of ILO bodies – something which should not be done in the interest of a pressing cause, especially since the Director-General sends a fact-finding mission every year in application of the two above-mentioned resolutions. I ask whether there is any doubt as to the veracity of the information and data contained in the Director-General's Report, which is acknowledged by all to be objective, honest and serious.

2. The records of the Office's Committee on Freedom of Association are full of countless complaints against the Israeli occupation authorities alleging the violation of trade union rights and freedoms, including cases Nos. 567, 797, 811, 1,290 and 1,414, to mention but a few. What purpose have these complaints served? In spite of the clarity and transparency of the recommendations formulated by the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Israeli occupation authorities have failed to take any of these recommendations into account, as evidenced by the fact that these cases of violation of trade union rights and freedoms are still open. The Director-General's Report this year clearly attests to this. You can see for yourselves if you turn to paragraph 98; that way I shall not have to go into the details which are familiar to all of you.

3. Many statements have been made in accordance with article 24 of the Constitution, the latest being the opinion submitted in 1986 by the Legal Adviser to the 233rd Session of the Governing Body, which clearly stated that the occupation of Arab territories by Israel in 1967 could not be considered as having the effect of extending to the territories occupied by Israel the obligations arising from the Conventions it had ratified. Consequently, the Governing Body considered that the representation submitted in accordance with article 24 was not receivable. The Legal Adviser moreover was of the opinion that the cases submitted under article 26 of the Constitution would be irreceivable. I wonder if there are other articles we can invoke to have the ILO receive our complaints. Perhaps the American delegate can tell us.

4. Those who attended the 63rd Session of the Conference in 1977 know that the Conference rejected the report of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards on the grounds that the Committee had exceeded its prerogatives and mandate, by examining reports submitted by occupation authorities which did not have the right, under the provisions of international law, to extend the scope of these laws to citizens subject to military occupation.

5. Other supervisory bodies deal with ordinary situations in the context of the international labour code, in other words, cases involving sovereign States, or a sovereign State and its own citizens. As for military occupation, it is an extraordinary situation which consequently requires extraordinary measures. At present, the ILO Constitution has no article covering such cases, which lie beyond the usual relations between nations and peoples.

To sum up, your Conference, as a supreme authority, remains competent to monitor this extraordinary situation until the occupation ends and the Palestinian people is free to exercise its right of self-determination and sovereignty over its territory. This sitting is but one manifestation of the ILO's obligation to give due attention to the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories, until such time as the Conference establishes a standing committee to deal with this question."

19 1 Right-hand column, eighth line. The new sentence should begin: "It also considered…".

14 Left-hand column, speech by Mrs. CÉLESTIN SAUREL (Minister of Social Affairs, Haiti). In the second full paragraph, the second sentence should begin: "Another way of governing can inspire…".

26 Left-hand column, speech by Mr. PAN (Employers' delegate, China). The first paragraph should end: "Its urban labour force is composed of 148 million people, and more than 100 million of its massive rural labour force shifted to township enterprises by the end of last year. As the employers' organization in China, we are naturally concerned with this issue."

19	45	Speech by Mr. AHMAD MOHD IDRUS (Government delegate, Malaysia). In the sixth line the sentence should begin: "The Government decides...". In the second paragraph, second line, replace "a" by "the". In the last paragraph, first line, delete the word "have".
20	7	Right-hand column, under the heading "Record vote on the resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for 1994-95..." the statement by the Clerk of the Conference should read: "The result of the vote is as follows: 381 in favour, 6 against, with 26 abstentions...".
	17	At the top of the page, the figure for the number of votes in favour of the resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for 1994-95 should be 381.
3	14	Right-hand column. Beginning with the eighth line, the text should read: "... the Government member of France submitted a subamendment which read: "When, in an exporting member State...".
5	20	Right-hand column, the third full paragraph beginning "It recalled..." should be joined to the preceding paragraph, following on from "Committee of Experts".
	24	Right-hand column, under Cuba, at the end of the seventh paragraph, after "any form of pressure" add: "nor conditions such as those invoked for the exercise of such rights".
	25	Left-hand column. The last sentence in the second full paragraph, beginning "A union recognized..." should in fact come at the end of the first full paragraph, after "coercion."
	29	Right-hand column. The first full paragraph, beginning "Finally..." should be joined to the preceding paragraph.
	31	The third paragraph beginning "In addition..." should be deleted and on pages 31 and 32, the text between the fourth full paragraph of the right-hand column ("The Workers' members...") and the end of the third full paragraph of the right-hand column on page 32 ("... upon their request.") should be removed and added to the end of the information concerning Cuba (Convention No. 87) on page 38, and preceded by the following paragraph: "In addition, a Government representative reiterated the written information presented by her Government with respect to the right of workers to establish trade union organizations as they wished in conformity with section 13 of the Labour Code. As for the conclusions formulated by the Committee on Freedom of Association mentioned by the Experts, she stated that they had been changed at the 286th Session of the Governing Body and that independently of any interpretation the real and objective fact was that the person who had made the propaganda of the ICFTU was not a trade unionist and, in addition, he had not followed up, in writing, the letter containing the request for information which had served as the basis for the ICFTU's complaint."

	38	Right-hand column. After the fourth full paragraph, the words "See also under Convention No. 105" should be deleted and inserted at the end of the section on Ecuador, i.e. on page 39 after the paragraph ending "... with regard to the whole of the legislation".
	40	Left-hand column. The last paragraph, concerning Japan, should be replaced by the following: "A Government representative stated that the basic observations of the Government on the question of the right to organize of fire-fighting personnel had been given in its previous annual reports sent to the Office and that since 1990 periodic consultations between the responsible ministries and the All-Prefectural Municipal Workers' Union (JICHIRO) had been taking place and they had agreed to consult each other so as to find a solution to the problem of the right to organize of fire-fighting personnel within a period of two years. Recently there had been frequent discussions on how to find concrete solutions. Important efforts had also been made to gain a wider understanding of the problems involved and to be able to transmit the necessary information to the members of the Diet and to the trade unions. Despite all the efforts and consultations, a solution still had not been found since the problem had a long history and concerned a large number of people. The Government nevertheless continued to make all possible efforts not to interrupt the ongoing negotiations. It was expecting to take various measures and to have more frequent exchanges of information with the parties concerned and the ILO. To the extent possible it would be providing the ILO with all the available information."

25	40	Right-hand column. In the first full paragraph insert "Japan" after "The Workers' member of". The third full paragraph should be replaced by the following: "The Government representative stated that, while cooperating closely and fully with the ILO, his Government considered that a significant means of finding a solution to the problem would be to invite the parties concerned in the ILO to come to Japan to meet the responsible officials there and obtain direct information. He expressed his Government's willingness to cooperate with the Office." At the end of the fourth full paragraph, add "Japan" after "... the desired results in". The fifth full paragraph should end "... and the Workers' member of Japan had not referred to it".
	41	Left-hand column. The fourth full paragraph should read as follows: "The Government representative stated that, to the extent possible, his Government would provide the appropriate information, as requested by the Committee of Experts, with regard to the right to strike of public servants."
	42	Left-hand column. In the third full paragraph insert "Japan" after "The Workers' member of".
	43	Left-hand column. In the first full paragraph insert "Japan" after "A Workers' member of". Right-hand column. In the twelfth line a new paragraph should start with the words "The Government representative indicated...". At the end of the present first full paragraph, the last sentence, i.e. "The Workers' members recalled that they had requested a special paragraph for this case." should constitute a separate paragraph.
	47	Left-hand column. In the second full paragraph the second sentence, beginning "The Workers' member of the Netherlands...", should mark the start of a new paragraph. Right-hand column. In lines 2 and 3 the words "of Sweden" should be deleted.
	50	Left-hand column. In the penultimate line the words "occupations and" should be inserted before "sectors". Right-hand column. In the first full paragraph, line 7, after "... between men and women." insert "Such objective measures included the labour market." The fourth full paragraph should read "The Government representative stated that she had taken note of the comments made by the members of the Committee."
	51	Left-hand column, top of page. The following should be added after the observations of the Committee concerning Japan (Convention No. 100): "The Government member of Japan stated that she had a few things to say about the beginning of the conclusions adopted by the Committee, although she was not asking for changes. The beginning of the conclusions was an inexact citation of the Government which had not stated that it intended to introduce changes of policies directly aimed at applying the Convention but rather that it wished to examine related policies which would result in the narrowing of the average wage gaps between men and women which was an indirect aim of the Convention."
	52	Right-hand column. The final paragraph should begin: "Brazil (ratification: 1965). A Government representative recognized...".
	59	The last paragraph at the bottom of the left-hand column (concerning Saudi Arabia) and the first paragraph at the top of the right-hand column should be joined.
	63	Right-hand column. In the third full paragraph delete "of New Zealand" after "The Government representative".
	66	Left-hand column. The third and fourth full paragraphs should be joined.

I

Resolution concerning the procedure at the Eighth African Regional Conference[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling that, in the light of the reforms introduced on an experimental basis at the Eleventh Asian Regional Conference and the Thirteenth Conference of American States Members of the ILO to reduce the length and cost of regional conferences, the Governing Body has decided that it is necessary to continue the experimental procedure for the Eighth African Regional Conference and that, pending revision of the Rules concerning the Powers, Functions and Procedure of Regional Conferences Convened by the International Labour Organization, authority should be given to the said Conference to derogate from them, as required, to implement these changes on an experimental basis before deciding on a possible revision of the above-mentioned Rules;

Hereby authorizes the Eighth African Regional Conference, by way of derogation from the applicable Rules:

(a) to consider the business carried out at preliminary group meetings preceding the formal opening of the Conference as having been carried out in official group meetings;

(b) to dispense with the appointment of a Selection Committee and entrust its functions (except in respect of resolutions for which a Resolutions Committee may be appointed under article 13, paragraph 3, of the Rules) to the Officers of the Conference;

(c) to limit the composition of the Resolutions Committee to not more than five members from each group;

(d) to authorize, in case of need, any drafting subcommittee or other subsidiary body set up by a committee of the Conference to report direct to the plenary of the Conference instead of through the Committee;

(e) to suspend the requirement that reports on technical items of the agenda be dispatched by the Office so as to reach governments at least three months before the opening of the Conference if any such report is included in a single volume with the other reports of the Director-General, which would thus be required to reach governments two months beforehand;

(f) to reduce the time-limit for addresses to the Conference from 15 to ten minutes.

II

Resolution concerning exposure to and safety in the use of biological agents at work[2]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recognizing that the increasing exposure to and use of biological agents calls for an increased international awareness of the hazards and risks from those agents,

Recognizing that the increasing exposure to and use of biological agents in a wide range of processes and products require that appropriate measures are taken to minimize the risks to workers, the public and the environment,

[1] Adopted on 3 June 1993.

[2] Adopted on 21 June 1993.

Noting that the special nature of the hazards and risks of the exposure to and use of biological agents may require safeguards not appropriate to the provisions of the Convention and Recommendation concerning the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents and other international labour Conventions and Recommendations;

Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General:

(1) to take steps to address the question of exposure to and safety in the use of biological agents at work;

(2) to consider the need for new international instruments in order to minimize the risks to workers, the public and the environment.

III

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Part-time work"[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having adopted the report of the Committee appointed to consider the fifth item on the agenda,

Having in particular approved as general conclusions, with a view to the consultation of Governments, proposals for a Convention and a Recommendation concerning part-time work;

Decides that an item entitled "Part-time work" shall be included in the agenda of its next ordinary session for a second discussion regarding the proposed adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation concerning part-time work.

IV

Resolution concerning social protection and the alleviation of unemployment and poverty, and the social dimension of structural adjustment and transition to a market economy[2]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling the Preamble to the Constitution of the ILO which stipulates that universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice,

Further recalling the Declaration of Philadelphia which states that poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere,

Stating that social protection is a right which should be enjoyed by every member of society,

Noting the Report of the Director-General to the present session of the Conference, entitled Social insurance and social protection, which identifies joint prerequisites for the development of social protection programmes, including full employment, steady economic growth, the existence of functioning financial markets and institutions, stable and democratic political structures, good governance and administration and, above all, a social consensus which supports the redistribution of income,

Considering that the social and living conditions of people become particularly vulnerable during periods of profound political and economic change,

Considering the problems arising out of poverty, inadequate social security coverage and limited access to health care,

Recognizing that high unemployment has a particularly adverse effect on social protection, including pension schemes and unemployment benefits,

[1] Adopted on 22 June 1993.

[2] Adopted on 21 June 1993.

Convinced that economic efficiency and growth, and their interaction with adequate social protection, are important prerequisites for successful national development, and that economic reforms should also lead to sustainable social progress,

Noting with concern the constraints faced particularly by developing countries such as an adverse economic environment and limited resources that constitute major impediments to full realization of a comprehensive and viable social protection scheme,

Underlining the importance of the efforts exercised by countries implementing structural adjustment programmes, particularly developing countries, and regretting in this context the adverse effects those programmes have in many cases entailed for social protection,

Convinced also that the alleviation of poverty is closely linked to the need to promote full, freely chosen and productive employment and that the application of all relevant international labour standards has an important contribution to make in countering unemployment and exclusion, and helping disadvantaged groups,

Recognizing that the main responsibility for establishing a suitable legal framework for social protection rests with governments, and noting the importance of dialogue and cooperation between governments and employers' and workers' organizations in formulating and carrying out relevant policies,

Stressing the specific mandate of the ILO to contribute to the promotion and strengthening of social justice, and that its assistance would be particularly useful in situations of structural adjustment,

Welcoming the proposal that the alleviation of poverty should be one of the priority objectives of the ILO's programme of activities for 1994-95,

Emphasizing the central role which the ILO should play in the preparation, convening and follow-up of the 1995 World Summit for Social Development, where both employment and the alleviation of poverty are core issues;

1. Invites governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organizations:

(a) to take adequate measures for creating favourable conditions for social dialogue, particularly in the course of structural adjustment;

(b) to ensure that economic and structural reforms are carried out with due regard to the interests of all sectors of the population, and measures are taken to protect workers to the extent possible against the adverse effects of structural change, including by establishing appropriate mechanisms, such as vocational training and skills development programmes, for assisting those affected by structural adjustment;

(c) to make the alleviation of poverty and unemployment, and the need to promote job creation, principal goals of their economic and social policy, and to encourage policies which are in accordance with the principles of equality of opportunity and treatment and which reduce exclusion and marginalization;

(d) to develop, with the participation of workers' and employers' organizations, as appropriate, policies for economic growth and employment generation which will contribute to the strengthening of social protection systems, especially for the most vulnerable groups of the population;

(e) to integrate social protection measures in the initiation, design and implementation of structural adjustment programmes and programmes of transition to a market economy by taking into account their impact on employment, incomes, poverty and the well-being of the whole population;

(f) to extend social protection as an important element of a wider economic and social development strategy with a view to providing a basic income to all in need of social protection and establishing social assistance mechanisms to alleviate the consequences of poverty;

(g) to promote social protection schemes, based on the principles of insurance, solidarity and shared responsibility, with the participation of employers' and workers' organizations;

(h) to review their economic and social policies in the light of their contribution to the eradication of unemployment and the promotion of full, freely chosen and productive employment through sustained economic growth and development, and having regard to the principles of all relevant international labour standards;

(i) to continue to promote tripartite cooperation in the World Summit for Social Development, and all other appropriate forums, in advancing the goals stated above.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to give special importance to social protection for the population and particularly for the most vulnerable groups in the implementation of the ILO's programme of work and the planning of future activities;

(b) to promote advisory services and technical cooperation which are necessary for the development of mechanisms of social protection in developing countries and those countries which have embarked on the transition to a market economy or are engaged in the process of structural adjustment, and to analyse their effectiveness in improving social protection in these countries;

(c) to assist governments in incorporating programmes of social protection in their economic, labour market and social development policies;

(d) to provide advice and assistance to the governments of member States in elaborating and updating their social legislation;

(e) to collect, make known and exchange, on a regular basis, information on the measures taken in member States as regards social protection during periods of structural adjustment, and to promote research on social and economic needs, demographic trends and methods for financing social protection;

(f) to ensure that the problems of poverty, exclusion and unemployment, and the need to promote job creation and access to employment and social protection for disadvantaged groups, are given due attention in the preparation of the Second High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment;

(g) to develop, intensify and institutionalize close cooperation with the international financial institutions such as the IMF, the World Bank, the regional reconstruction and development banks and other international bodies concerned with a view to having their programmes of assistance take into account the need for social protection, and thus contribute to mitigating the adverse effects of structural adjustment programmes;

(h) to monitor closely the contribution of ILO activities to the alleviation of poverty, which is one of the priority objectives in the 1994-95 programme, and to present a final evaluation at the end of the biennium, with appropriate proposals concerning research and analysis, technical cooperation, standards and other ILO work;

(i) to take measures to ensure the essential contribution of the ILO, through its tripartite structure, in the preparation, convening and follow-up of the World Summit for Social Development, giving particular emphasis to issues within the scope of the mandate of the ILO, which include the elimination of poverty, the promotion of full, freely chosen and productive employment, social protection and freedom of association.

V

Resolution concerning the role of the ILO in technical cooperation[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization, meeting at its 80th Session (1993),

Having undertaken a thorough review of ILO operational activities on the basis of Report VI entitled "The role of the ILO in technical cooperation",

[1] Adopted on 21 June 1993.

Bearing in mind the resolution concerning the role of the ILO in technical cooperation adopted at its 73rd (1987) Session; the resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth and the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment, adopted at its 79th (1992) Session; the resolution concerning rural employment promotion adopted at its 75th (1988) Session; the resolution concerning environment, development, employment and the role of the ILO, adopted at its 77th (1990) Session; and the resolution concerning adjustment and human resources development, adopted at its 79th (1992) Session,

Having regard to the resolution concerning self-employment promotion adopted at its 77th (1990) Session; the resolution concerning structural adjustment, industrial relations and economic and social development, adopted at its 78th (1991) Session; and the resolution concerning ILO action for women workers adopted at its 78th (1991) Session,

Recalling resolutions 44/211 and 47/199 of the United Nations General Assembly concerning operational activities for development of the United Nations system, adopted in 1989 and 1992 respectively, its resolution 45/199 proclaiming the Fourth United Nations Development Decade, as well as recent decisions of the UNDP Governing Council on programme approach, national execution, and the new support cost arrangements,

Recalling the plan of action adopted at the Second United Nations Conference on Least Developed Countries in 1990,

Recalling Agenda 21 adopted at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development in 1992,

Recalling Consultation (Industrial and National Levels) Recommendation (No. 113) adopted at its 44th (1960) Session and Employment Policy Convention (No. 122) adopted at its 48th (1964) Session,

Reaffirming that the tripartite structure is the unique strength of the ILO, enabling it to associate workers' and employers' organizations along with governments, in a genuine active partnership process which, in turn, broadens and enriches the operational activities carried out by the Organization,

Reaffirming the relevancy of the document, noted by the 252nd (March 1992) Session of the ILO Governing Body concerning international labour standards and technical cooperation;

Adopts the following conclusions and invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General to give due consideration to them in the formulation, implementation and evaluation of the technical cooperation programme.

Conclusions concerning the role of the ILO in technical cooperation

INTRODUCTION

1. Technical cooperation should remain a major means of action for the attainment of the objectives of the ILO, complementing other means of action, in accordance with its mandate defined in the Constitution, and in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

2. Technical cooperation should be implemented in accordance with the objectives of the ILO and the needs and priorities of the recipient countries and should be confined to the fields central to the ILO's competence, making full use of its comparative advantage and tripartite structure. The programme should furthermore focus on the strengthening of national capacities of developing countries in the fields of ILO competence to help them attain the goal of self-reliance.

3. Priorities for country-specific ILO technical cooperation activities should be identified at the country-level by relevant government agencies in close consultations with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations and the Office and other donors responsible for substantial programmes of technical cooperation in the country, as appropriate.

4. In view of the increasingly competitive development environment in which the Organization has to operate, every possible measure should be taken to strengthen its unique expertise obtained from its tripartite structure. This is to be achieved through the allocation of resources to the agreed priorities through the programme and budget process and the adoption of appropriate personnel policies supported by a need-based training programme which includes promotion of understanding of the concerns of the social partners.

5. ILO technical cooperation should be an integral part of the operational activities for development, and as such should be carried out in full coordination with the various programmes and agencies in the UN system in order to avoid unnecessary overlap and duplication, and bearing in mind the ILO's own distinct objectives and tripartite structure. Particular attention should be given to General Assembly resolutions 44/211 and 47/199, previously cited.

6. The Governing Body should intensify its efforts to monitor, review and evaluate the technical cooperation programme, particularly through its new Committee on Technical Cooperation. This process should include evaluation of the overall programme and specific findings with respect to key programme areas. Programme evaluation should be based on rigorous methodology approved by the Governing Body through its appropriate committee. It would be desirable for the International Labour Conference to undertake a comprehensive review of the programme at regular intervals, at least every five years.

OBJECTIVES AND PRIORITIES

(A) Substantive priorities

7. In the 1990s the ILO technical cooperation programme should focus on three major areas, namely, support for democratization, poverty alleviation which, inter alia, includes employment creation, and the protection of workers. They can be summarized as follows:

(a) The promotion of democratic and representative institutions based on a sound and equitable legal framework, consistent with the relevant international labour standards, should be in the forefront of ILO concerns.

(b) Full, productive and freely chosen employment is the most effective means of fighting poverty. Future technical cooperation activities should aim especially at helping ILO constituents to contribute to the formulation of economic policies which increase employment, ensure sustainable development and promote economic growth.

(c) Human resources development and training for employment continue to be priority concerns. ILO assistance should increasingly concentrate on strengthening national capacity to formulate a training policy closely linked to labour market analysis as well as on encouraging private-sector training, including training in entrepreneurship and enterprise development and promoting greater flexibility in public training systems. In this regard account should be taken of the Conclusions appended to the Resolution concerning adjustment and human resources development, adopted by the Conference at its 79th (1992) Session.

(d) In the field of social protection, particular attention should be paid to the development, reform, and wherever possible the extension of social security schemes, health care and social safety nets. Greater emphasis should be placed on improving working conditions, in particular for workers in hazardous occupations.

(e) Special attention should be given to the most vulnerable groups, emphasizing support for the development of employers' and workers' organizations, to enable their effective participation in the process of development.

(f) The elimination of child labour should be pursued through a comprehensive approach based on the relevant ILO standards, tripartism, multidisciplinarity, and gender specificity. The abolition of forced labour and the protection of migrant workers and disadvantaged groups should be pursued vigorously.

(g) ILO assistance for the development of all major components of national labour administration systems, inter alia by tripartite labour inspection evaluation missions, should continue to be made available.

8. The promotion of gender equality in all development activities should be a basic concern of the ILO's technical cooperation programme. The application of gender-specific performance indicators should be integrated throughout the ILO's technical cooperation programme. It is essential, taking previous experiences into account, to ensure the full participation of women in the planning, design, implementation and evaluation of ILO development programmes and projects and to incorporate gender-specific criteria at all stages of the programme and project cycles. In the implementation of the programmes, particular attention should be paid to the ILO plan of action on equality of opportunity and treatment of men and women in employment, the resolution concerning ILO action for women workers adopted at the 78th Session (1991) of the International Labour Conference and the series of ILO Conventions and Recommendations designed to combat discrimination based on gender.

(B) Major modalities

9. In order to make the most effective use of the limited resources at its disposal the ILO should focus its technical cooperation programme on a selected number of priorities central to its mandate in accordance with the specific needs of the constituents in the recipient countries and thus ensuring that the Organization does fewer things better.

10. ILO technical cooperation should help the member States to achieve progress towards the ratification of ILO Conventions and towards better application of international labour standards.

11. A renewed effort should be made to promote tripartism. Priority should be given to providing assistance to strengthen labour ministries and employers' and workers' organizations.

12. The ILO should do everything possible within its mandate to consolidate efforts geared to promoting viable and sustainable economic and social development of the least developed countries taking account of the programme of action adopted at the Second United Nations Conference on Least Developed Countries in 1990.

13. The ILO, in accordance with its mandate, should actively contribute to the implementation of Agenda 21 adopted in 1992 at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development. Particular attention should be paid to the relevant recommendations of the ILO Tripartite Advisory Meeting on Environment and the World of Work held in November 1992. Concern for environmental aspects and impact should be integrated in all technical cooperation. Operational guidelines should be prepared to ascertain that environmental concerns are integrated at all stages of the programme and project cycles.

SYNERGY BETWEEN INTERNATIONAL LABOUR STANDARDS AND TECHNICAL COOPERATION

14. Technical cooperation should not be seen as separate from other means of action, especially standard-setting and research. They should complement and reinforce each other in pursuing the ILO's objectives, thus contributing to development. ILO standards should thus be used as guiding principles for ILO technical cooperation activities.

15. Sensitization activities on the close complementarity between ILO standards and technical cooperation should be increasingly directed beyond the ILO and aim at funds, programmes and agencies in the United Nations system both at the central and country levels, multi-bilateral donors, international and regional financial institutions, in particular the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, ILO constituents, government officials and parliamentarians.

16. Within the ILO, the complementarity between ILO standard setting and technical cooperation needs to be implemented in order to promote economic and social progress through the ratification and effective application of international labour standards, in the spirit of positive and constructive responses to be given to the ILO's constituents, in accordance with the guidelines noted by the Governing Body at its 252nd Session (March 1992).

17. Greater use should be made of the ILO regular budget and other funds available for technical cooperation to promote such links between standards and technical cooperation.

PROMOTION OF TRIPARTISM AND SOCIAL DIALOGUE

18. In order to increase and sustain the democratization process in a growing number of countries, close consultations with employers' and workers' organizations on economic and social policy options are necessary. Given this trend, the ILO must be able to provide advisory services and training as requested, enabling these organizations to strengthen their capacity to collect and analyse information, effectively participate in social dialogue, and to assume their new responsibilities under national execution.

19. Every possible measure should be taken to ensure that the social partners participate in the planning, implementation and evaluation of various activities under the ILO technical cooperation programme. As appropriate, special efforts should be made to sensitize constituents to the concept and application of a tripartite approach.

20. Consultations with the UNDP should continue to strongly emphasize tripartite participation in UNDP-funded technical cooperation activities in the fields of ILO competence. In this regard, urgent and ongoing actions are required by both the ILO and the UNDP.

21. Multilateral and multi-bilateral donors should be encouraged to increase their contributions to programmes directly benefiting workers' and employers' organizations in the recipient countries.

22. Special efforts should be made by the Office to encourage member States to ratify and implement the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), and apply the Tripartite Consultation (Activities of the International Labour Organization) Recommendation, 1976 (No. 152).

KEY MANAGEMENT ISSUES

23. Given on the one hand, the many priorities indicated in these Conclusions and, on the other, the anticipated decline in funding and the clearly expressed need for the ILO to remain within its mandate, to make use of its comparative advantage and to do fewer things better, it is important to further develop a coherent ILO strategy for technical cooperation. Such a strategy should indicate clear priorities, feasible instruments for their attainment and a realistic timeframe. This will permit clear criteria for monitoring of progress by the Governing Body and the Conference and also ensure optimal use of scarce technical cooperation resources to achieve maximum impact. Accordingly, such a strategy document should be presented to the Committee on Technical Cooperation of the Governing Body as soon as possible, taking due account of the following key management issues.

(A) Funding

24. The ILO should continue to make every effort to ensure a steady and sufficient flow of resources for its programme, bearing in mind changing priorities and approaches. Consideration should be given to the best use of the UNDP Technical Support Services at the Programme Level (TSS1) facility both as a catalyst and a complement to research and policy advisory work under the ILO's regular budget. An appropriate amount of funds should be earmarked for RBTC which should continue to play a key role in the ILO technical cooperation programme. Priority attention should be given to those ILO activities central to the core mandate which do not attract sufficient extra-budgetary funds.

25. As the application of the national execution/implementation modality progresses, the level of resources made available by UNDP for ILO execution/implementation is expected to decline. The impact of this resource decline on the technical cooperation programme should be kept under constant review by the Governing Body with regular reports being presented to it for consideration and appropriate action.

26. Efforts should be made to establish and intensify collaboration with new multi-bilateral donors and with the European Community, and generally to make the ILO's technical cooperation programme better understood and valued in donor and recipient countries alike. Special emphasis should be given to promoting the comparative advantage of the ILO as a channel for multilateral programmes, particularly with respect to its potential to ensure cohesion, complementarity, effective monitoring and evaluation mechanisms.

27. In contrast to stagnation and potential decline in official development aid flows, a greater amount of resources are being transferred to developing countries from international and regional financial institutions and, recently, through private sector flows. These trends are increasingly influencing economic and social development issues in developing countries. Taking these developments into account, the Office should strengthen its dialogue with the financial development institutions in close collaboration with the Organization's tripartite constituents and pursue an active involvement in all relevant aspects and at appropriate levels of their operations, in order to promote the full incorporation of social objectives in the policies and operations of these institutions and to secure funding from these institutions for the ILO's involvement in those elements of their programmes of technical cooperation in which the ILO can offer a comparative advantage.

28. The concept of partnership should be extended to donors financing the ILO's technical cooperation activities by (a) the continuance and expansion of member States seconding expertise at no cost to the ILO technical cooperation activities; (b) workers' and employers' organizations in developed countries making expertise and resources available for ILO programmes in respect of their counterparts in developing countries; and (c) fuller commitment to make expertise and resources available for technical cooperation among developing countries (TCDC) and countries in transition.

(B) Coordination

29. As a part of the United Nations system, and with its long experience in training, the ILO should fully support and contribute to the renewed system-wide efforts to strengthen national capacities of recipient countries and to enhance the coherence and impact of the operational activities of the system as a whole at the country level taking into account national development objectives.

30. In the pursuance of the new modalities such as national execution, programme approach, and greater emphasis on policy and programme-level advisory services, it is important to take full account of the capacities and needs of the recipient countries. An effective ILO technical cooperation programme should be conceived and implemented at the country level as a blend of policy-oriented research, policy advisory services and the execution/implementation of projects.

31. Care should be taken to ensure that the ILO's principles and concerns are fully reflected in an integrated UN response at the country level in accordance with the country objectives to be jointly identified with ILO tripartite constituents. Programmes must be coordinated carefully with other programmes delivered by the United Nations system. There must also be careful coordination with other multilateral and bilateral donor organizations involved in similar fields of technical cooperation within each recipient country.

32. The ILO should actively participate in the planned evaluation of the new UNDP support cost arrangements and keep the Governing Body fully informed of the outcome.

(C) Programme implementation and evaluation

33. There is a continuing need for enhancing the relevance, cost-effectiveness and impact of technical cooperation, consistent with the General Assembly resolutions 44/211 and 47/199. In this regard renewed efforts should be made to strengthen the functions of planning, monitoring and evaluation of all ILO technical cooperation activities both at headquarters and in the field, irrespective of their source of financing, within the framework of the active partnership policy.

34. The ILO should gradually devolve project execution and implementation to the recipient countries themselves as and when they are prepared to assume such responsibility, while shifting focus to policy and programme level advisory services. In this process, the national capacity of the recipient country should be carefully assessed, in consultation with its social partners and with the funding agency as appropriate.

35. Particular attention should be given to monitoring the degree to which women are represented as beneficiaries within the ILO's technical cooperation work, both through programmes specifically directed towards them and through their participation in general programmes. This question should be the subject for ongoing consideration by the Governing Body Committee on Technical Cooperation to ensure that women are represented as fully as possible in all aspects of technical cooperation. ILO technical cooperation should be carried out in such a way as to promote the elimination of adverse discrimination.

36. Quality control of the design and formulation of technical cooperation programmes and projects should remain a major concern. However, good design is a necessary but not sufficient condition for the success of technical cooperation activities. Therefore, the ILO should pay closer attention, in cooperation with its partners, to developing adequate mechanisms for the identification and planning of programmes and projects at the country level and for the effective monitoring of their implementation.

37. Considerable experience has been gained from past technical cooperation activities, hence, there is a need for wide dissemination, both inside and outside the Organization, of lessons learned and for ensuring that these lessons are taken into account when planning and implementing future activities. The ILO's unique position as an integrator of tripartite perspectives and experience should be stressed.

38. The combination of self-evaluation and independent evaluations is considered a valid approach. Self-evaluation benefits from the technical knowledge and experience of those directly responsible for implementation, allows for increased accountability and facilitates feedback. Independent evaluations which utilize outside specialists from the relevant ILO constituents, add objectivity and credibility to the overall evaluation and serve to make technical cooperation activities more transparent and comparable.

39. The long-term impact and the sustainability of technical cooperation activities should be pursued more systematically by undertaking comprehensive ex-post evaluations. The results of such evaluations could then contribute to ensure a more effective use of future aid resources.

40. In order to effectively respond to constantly evolving needs of recipient countries, a careful examination has to be made to select and assign the most appropriate expertise, bearing in mind that there is a growing need for increased use of national and regional experts for short-term assignments as a means of strengthening local participation aimed at achieving cost-effectiveness and sustainability.

41. ILO activities for the procurement of equipment and the subcontracting of services should be carried out in support of its substantive technical cooperation operations, aiming at providing the most appropriate type and quality of equipment and services at the lowest possible cost in accordance with established competitive procedures including also advice to constituents on market trends and technology, seeking to increase procurement from developing and underutilized donor countries and training assistance.

42. The ILO International Training Centre in Turin should continue to act as a key training instrument covering, among others, project-related training complementary to the technical services provided by other ILO programmes. It should also contribute to the design and implementation of various training activities within the United Nations system with particular emphasis on the ILO's core mandate, and strengthening the management capacity of recipient governments and the social partners for technical cooperation and on fostering effective coordination and teamwork within the UN system itself. The Centre should also be fully utilized in various stages in the implementation of the active partnership policy.

43. In its efforts to promote technical cooperation among developing countries (TCDC), the ILO should focus on providing technical advisory services through regional, subregional, interregional and global exchanges. It should also encourage them to make greater effort to mobilize the necessary resources for self-reliance and equality.

ACTIVE PARTNERSHIP POLICY

44. An active and meaningful partnership between the ILO's constituents, on a tripartite basis, and the Office, in particular at the field level, should be established for the purpose of formulating technical cooperation programmes as part of an integrated programme covering all areas of action of the ILO for the benefit of member States.

45. The various elements of the active partnership policy including the formulation of country objectives and the deployment of multidisciplinary teams should be vigorously implemented and carefully monitored.

46. The proposed country objectives will provide a framework for the ILO's operations in a given country. In formulating objectives, full consultations should be undertaken with the tripartite constituents to ensure that their priorities and concerns are fully integrated in the objectives so identified. This would be without prejudice to the policy of the ILO to assist the social partners directly. The country objectives should contribute effectively to, and take account of national development plans and priorities and be coordinated with the country strategy supported by the international development partners. In drawing up the country objectives particular care should be taken to ensure that the authorities in the country concerned are fully committed to taking forward and where appropriate implementing the conclusions of any projects designed to offer advice on policy or planning.

47. The ILO should increasingly concentrate on the provision of policy advice and assistance for the development of local capacities for the planning, monitoring and evaluation of technical cooperation activities. In this connection the ILO needs to concentrate more on policy-oriented and evaluation research, and the results achieved through technical cooperation, in addition to methodological and conceptual research. ILO research and studies should increasingly be judged a success in terms of their relevance to policy application. Emphasis needs to be placed both on country-specific studies carried out at the regional level and on comparative research and analysis going beyond the geographical boundaries of MDTs, to be performed by headquarters.

48. The growing complexity of social and economic issues demands a multidisciplinary approach to the provision of policy advice and other technical services and the integration of specific disciplines in a practical approach to development needs. The ILO has already taken various measures to promote and apply a multidisciplinary approach including the implementation of interdepartmental projects, the establishment of multidisciplinary teams and conceptual work being undertaken. This effort should be continued and intensified. The ILO should develop its conceptual framework and specific analytical tools to enable the effective application of multidisciplinarity.

49. Under the authority of the regional director, ILO offices should have responsibility for the identification of needs, in close consultation with the tripartite constituency, and for the management of ILO activities in the countries or subregions they cover, with the technical support of the multidisciplinary teams, and with appropriate support and overall guidance from headquarters.

50. The multidisciplinary teams should have clearly defined and structured objectives, and work plans which would permit evaluation of progress within a given time-frame. To ensure their most effective functioning, special attention needs to be given to team composition, coordination and management as well as training. The location and the composition of the multidisciplinary teams should be kept under constant review by the Governing Body so that they may effectively respond to the changing needs of the countries and regions. Special attention should be given by the Governing Body to ensuring that MDTs do include skills required to deal with particular issues such as child labour, social security issues and the transition to market economies.

51. The MDTs should be actively supported by the technical departments, interacting with headquarters' staff, other MDTs and other organizations within the United Nations system. As a consequence of the tripartite structure of the ILO, the employers' and workers' specialists within each MDT should, while working closely with other members of the team, report to their respective headquarters' bureau. Maximum collaboration with and use of local expertise and institutions should be promoted and periodically monitored by the Governing Body Committee on Technical Cooperation.

52. The progress in the implementation of the active partnership policy should be periodically reported to the Governing Body and included in overall evaluation of achievements and impact by the International Labour Conference, at least every five years.

VI

Resolution concerning the granting to Romania of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization;

Having regard to the terms of the financial arrangement adopted by the Conference at its 77th Session (1990) for the settlement of the arrears of Romania;

Having regard further to the fact that Romania has brought itself up to date within the terms of the financial arrangement by payment of the balance of the amounts due in 1992 on 5 February 1993;

Decides that Romania be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization.

[1] Adopted on 8 June 1993.

VII

Resolution concerning outstanding debts of member States and the right to vote[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Decides that article 10, paragraph 7, of the Financial Regulations shall be amended to read as follows (deletions in square brackets, additions in italics):

> Any payment in respect of contributions made by a Member of the Organization which has not paid in full its contribution for previous calendar years shall, unless the Conference decides otherwise in particular cases, be credited against the earliest in date of such arrears, including amounts outstanding in relation to payment of contributions during former periods of membership, notwithstanding any expression of intention to the contrary by the debtor Member. Where arrears or such outstanding amounts have been consolidated, a Member of the Organization is required to pay its annual instalment [in respect of arrears] in full before liquidating its current contribution for the year in question.

VIII

Resolution concerning a change in treatment of income from sales of publications[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Decides to amend with effect from 1 January 1994 paragraph 2 of article 11 of the Financial Regulations, which reads as follows:

> The Director-General may pay up to 75 per cent of the income from the sale of publications, including related royalties and fees, into a Publications Revolving Fund in accordance with rules to be established for the Fund under article 40 of these Regulations.

by substituting the figure 100 per cent for that of 75 per cent.

IX

Resolution concerning the Working Capital Fund[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling that, at the 248th Session (November 1990) of the Governing Body, the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee had set up a Working Party to review the current arrangements governing the Working Capital Fund,

Recognizing that amendments to the Financial Regulations are required in order to implement the recommendations of the Governing Body concerning the operation of the Working Capital Fund;

Decides that the level of the Working Capital Fund on 1 January 1993 be set at 35 million Swiss francs and that any remaining balance be transferred to an Income Adjustment Account.

Decides to approve, in accordance with article 41 of the Financial Regulations and effective from 1 January 1993, the amendments to the Regulations set out in Appendix I to this report.

X

Resolution concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

In accordance with Article III of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization; Extends the term of office of Miss Mella Carroll (Ireland) as judge by a further period of three years.

XI

Resolution concerning the proposed gift of land by the Government of Pakistan for ILO premises in Islamabad [1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Authorizes the Governing Body, pursuant to article 12, paragraph 1, of the Financial Regulations, to accept, if it thinks fit after a full examination of the matter, the gift of a plot of leasehold land made by the Government of Pakistan, for the purpose of constructing premises to house the ILO office in Islamabad.

XII

Resolution concerning the assessment of the 1991 and 1992 contributions of new member States [1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

In accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations,

(a) decides that the contributions to the ILO budget of the new member States listed in column 1 of Appendix II to this document for the periods of their membership in 1991 and 1992 be based on the annual assessment rates shown for each in column 4 of Appendix II to this document;

(b) decides that the resulting assessments for 1991 and 1992 of Armenia, Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lithuania, Moldova and Uzbekistan appearing in columns 7 and 8 of Appendix II to this document be deducted from the assessments of the former USSR for those years;

(c) decides that the resulting assessments for 1992 of Croatia and Slovenia as appearing in column 8 of Appendix II to this document be deducted from the 1992 assessment of Yugoslavia.

XIII

Resolutions concerning assessment of the 1993 contributions of new member States [1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, that the contributions for the periods of membership in 1993 of any States which formed part of the former USSR which may become Members of the ILO before 1 January 1994 be based on their rates of assessment for 1993 in the United Nations, and that the resulting total of their assessments be deducted from the assessment of the Russian Federation for 1993.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

In accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations,

(a) decides that the rates of assessment for 1993 of Croatia and Slovenia be 0.13 per cent and 0.09 per cent respectively;

(b) decides that the total of their rates of assessment for 1993 be deducted from the rate of assessment of Yugoslavia for 1993.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, that consideration of the rates of assessment of the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic for their periods of membership in the Organization in 1993 be deferred to the 81st (June 1994) Session of the International Labour Conference.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

In accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations,

(a) decides that the contribution of Bosnia and Herzegovina to the ILO budget for the period of its membership of the Organization during 1993 be based on an annual assessment rate of 0.04 per cent;

(b) decides that the resulting assessment for 1993 of Bosnia and Herzegovina be deducted from the 1993 assessment of Yugoslavia.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, that consideration of the rates of assessment of Eritrea and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia for their periods of membership in the Organization in 1993 and for 1994 be deferred to the 81st (June 1994) Session of the International Labour Conference.

XIV

Resolution concerning the scale of assessment of contributions for 1994[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

In accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations,

(a) decides to adopt the draft scale of assessments for the year 1994 as set out in column 3 (headed "Percentage 1994") of Appendix V to this document.

(b) decides that in the event that additional States become members of the ILO during the current (80th) Session of the Conference, the draft scale of assessments for 1994 be further revised to include such new member States at rates of assessment based on their rates of assessment for 1994 in the United Nations.

XV

Resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for 1994-95 and the allocation of the budget of income among member States[2]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

In virtue of the Financial Regulations, passes for the 64th financial period, ending 31 December 1995, the budget of expenditure for the International Labour Organization amounting to US$466,510,000 and the budget of income amounting to US$466,510,000, which, at the budget rate of exchange of Swiss francs 1.45 to the US dollar, amounts to Swiss francs 676,439,500, and resolves that the budget of income, denominated in Swiss francs, shall be allocated among member States in accordance with the scale of contributions recommended by the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

Convention 174

CONVENTION CONCERNING THE PREVENTION OF MAJOR INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENTS

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its 80th Session on 2 June 1993, and

Noting the relevant international labour Conventions and Recommendations and, in particular, the Occupational Safety and Health Convention and Recommendation, 1981, and the Chemicals Convention and Recommendation, 1990, and stressing the need for a global and coherent approach, and

Noting also the ILO Code of practice on the Prevention of major industrial accidents, published in 1991, and Having regard to the need to ensure that all appropriate measures are taken to:

(a) prevent major accidents;

(b) minimize the risks of major accidents;

(c) minimize the effects of major accidents, and

Considering the causes of such accidents including organizational errors, the human factor, component failures, deviation from normal operational conditions, outside interference and natural forces, and

Having regard to the need for cooperation, within the International Programme on Chemical Safety, between the International Labour Organization, the United Nations Environment Programme and the World Health Organization, as well as with other relevant intergovernmental organizations, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the prevention of major industrial accidents, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and adopts this twenty-second day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-three the following Convention, which may be cited as the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention, 1993.

PART I. SCOPE AND DEFINITIONS

Article 1

1. The purpose of this Convention is the prevention of major accidents involving hazardous substances and the limitation of the consequences of such accidents.

2. This Convention applies to major hazard installations.

3. This Convention does not apply to:

(a) nuclear installations and plants processing radioactive substances except for facilities handling non-radioactive substances at these installations;

(b) military installations;

(c) transport outside the site of an installation other than by pipeline.

4. A Member ratifying this Convention may, after consulting the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned and other interested parties who may be affected, exclude from the application of the Convention installations or branches of economic activity for which equivalent protection is provided.

CONVENTION CONCERNANT LA PRÉVENTION DES ACCIDENTS INDUSTRIELS MAJEURS

La Conférence générale de l'Organisation internationale du Travail,

Notant les conventions et recommandations internationales du travail pertinentes, en particulier la convention et la recommandation sur la sécurité et la santé des travailleurs, 1981, ainsi que la convention et la recommandation sur les produits chimiques, 1990, et soulignant la nécessité d'une démarche globale et cohérente;

Notant également le Recueil de directives pratiques sur la prévention des accidents industriels majeurs, publié par le BIT en 1991;

Tenant compte de la nécessité de veiller à ce que toutes les mesures appropriées soient prises pour:

a) prévenir les accidents majeurs;

b) réduire au minimum les risques d'accident majeur;

c) réduire au minimum les effets de tels accidents;

Considérant les causes de ces accidents, notamment les défauts d'organisation, les facteurs humains, les défaillances de composants, les déviations par rapport aux conditions normales de fonctionnement, les événements extérieurs ainsi que les phénomènes naturels;

Se référant à la nécessité d'une coopération, au sein du Programme international sur la sécurité des produits chimiques, entre l'Organisation internationale du Travail, le Programme des Nations Unies pour l'environnement et l'Organisation mondiale de la santé, ainsi qu'avec d'autres organisations intergouvernementales concernées;

Après avoir décidé que ces propositions prendraient la forme d'une convention internationale, adopte, ce vingt-deuxième jour de juin mil neuf cent quatre-vingt-treize, la convention ci-après, qui sera dénommée Convention sur la prévention des accidents industriels majeurs, 1993.

PARTIE I. CHAMP D'APPLICATION ET DÉFINITIONS

Article 1

1. La présente convention a pour objet la prévention des accidents majeurs mettant en jeu des produits chimiques dangereux et la limitation des conséquences de ces accidents.

2. La convention s'applique aux installations à risques d'accident majeur.

3. La convention ne s'applique pas:

a) aux installations nucléaires et usines traitant des substances radioactives, à l'exception des aménagements de ces installations où sont traitées des substances non radioactives;

b) aux installations militaires;

c) au transport en dehors du site d'une installation autrement que par pipeline.

4. Un Membre qui ratifie la présente convention peut, après consultation des organisations représentatives d'employeurs et de travailleurs intéressées ainsi que d'autres parties intéressées pouvant être touchées, exclure du champ d'application de la convention des installations ou branches d'activité économique où une protection équivalente est assurée.

Article 2

Where special problems of a substantial nature arise so that it is not immediately possible to implement all the preventive and protective measures provided for in this Convention, a Member shall draw up plans, in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers and with other interested parties who may be affected, for the progressive implementation of the said measures within a fixed time-frame.

Article 3

For the purposes of this Convention:

(a) the term "hazardous substance" means a substance or mixture of substances which by virtue of chemical, physical or toxicological properties, either singly or in combination, constitutes a hazard;

(b) the term "threshold quantity" means for a given hazardous substance or category of substances that quantity, prescribed in national laws and regulations by reference to specific conditions, which if exceeded identifies a major hazard installation;

(c) the term "major hazard installation" means one which produces, processes, handles, uses, disposes of or stores, either permanently or temporarily, one or more hazardous substances or categories of substances in quantities which exceed the threshold quantity;

(d) the term "major accident" means a sudden occurrence – such as a major emission, fire or explosion – in the course of an activity within a major hazard installation, involving one or more hazardous substances and leading to a serious danger to workers, the public or the environment, whether immediate or delayed;

(e) the term "safety report" means a written presentation of the technical, management and operational information covering the hazards and risks of a major hazard installation and their control and providing justification for the measures taken for the safety of the installation;

(f) the term "near miss" means any sudden event involving one or more hazardous substances which, but for mitigating effects, actions or systems, could have escalated to a major accident.

PART II. GENERAL PRINCIPLES

Article 4

1. In the light of national laws and regulations, conditions and practices, and in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers and with other interested parties who may be affected, each Member shall formulate, implement and periodically review a coherent national policy concerning the protection of workers, the public and the environment against the risk of major accidents.

2. This policy shall be implemented through preventive and protective measures for major hazard installations and, where practicable, shall promote the use of the best available safety technologies.

Article 5

1. The competent authority, or a body approved or recognized by the competent authority, shall, after consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers and other interested parties who may be affected, establish a system for the identification of major hazard installations as defined in Article 3 (c), based on a list of hazardous substances or of categories of hazardous substances or of both, together with their respective threshold quantities, in accordance with national laws and regulations or international standards.

Lorsque des problèmes particuliers d'une certaine importance se posent, de sorte qu'il n'est pas possible de mettre en œuvre immédiatement l'ensemble des mesures de prévention et de protection prévues par la convention, le Membre devra, en consultation avec les organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs les plus représentatives ainsi qu'avec d'autres parties intéressées pouvant être touchées, établir des plans pour l'application desdites mesures par étapes et selon un calendrier fixé.

Article 3

Aux fins de la convention:

a) l'expression «produit dangereux» désigne un produit pur ou sous forme de mélange qui, du fait de propriétés chimiques, physiques ou toxicologiques, présente, seul ou en combinaison avec d'autres, un danger;

b) l'expression «quantité seuil» désigne, pour chaque produit ou catégorie de produit dangereux, la quantité spécifiée par la législation nationale pour des conditions déterminées qui, si elle est dépassée, identifie une installation à risques d'accident majeur;

c) l'expression «installation à risques d'accident majeur» désigne celle qui produit, transforme, manutentionne, utilise, élimine ou stocke, en permanence ou temporairement, un ou plusieurs produits ou catégories de produits dangereux en des quantités qui dépassent la quantité seuil;

d) l'expression «accident majeur» désigne un événement soudain, tel qu'une émission, un incendie ou une explosion d'importance majeure, dans le déroulement d'une activité au sein d'une installation à risques d'accident majeur, mettant en jeu un ou plusieurs produits dangereux et entraînant un danger grave, immédiat ou différé, pour les travailleurs, la population ou l'environnement;

e) l'expression «rapport de sécurité» désigne un document écrit présentant des informations techniques, de gestion et de fonctionnement relatives aux dangers et risques que comporte une installation à risques d'accident majeur et à la maîtrise desdits dangers et risques, et justifiant les mesures prises pour la sécurité de l'installation;

f) le terme «quasi-accident» désigne tout événement soudain mettant en jeu un ou plusieurs produits dangereux qui, en l'absence d'effets, d'actions ou de systèmes d'atténuation, aurait pu aboutir à un accident majeur.

PARTIE II. PRINCIPES GÉNÉRAUX

Article 4

1. Tout Membre doit, eu égard à la législation, aux conditions et aux pratiques nationales et en consultation avec les organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs les plus représentatives ainsi qu'avec d'autres parties intéressées pouvant être touchées, formuler, mettre en œuvre et revoir périodiquement une politique nationale cohérente relative à la protection des travailleurs, de la population et de l'environnement contre les risques d'accident majeur.

2. Cette politique doit être mise en œuvre par des mesures de prévention et de protection pour les installations à risques d'accident majeur et, dans la mesure où cela est réalisable, doit promouvoir l'utilisation des meilleures techniques de sécurité disponibles.

Article 5

1. L'autorité compétente ou un organisme agréé ou reconnu par l'autorité compétente doit, après consultation des organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs les plus représentatives et d'autres parties intéressées pouvant être touchées, établir un système permettant d'identifier les installations à risques d'accident majeur telles que définies à l'article 3 c) sur la base d'une liste de produits dangereux ou de catégories de produits dangereux, ou des deux, avec leurs quantités seuils respectives, conformément à la législation nationale ou aux normes internationales.

2. The system mentioned in paragraph 1 above shall be regularly reviewed and updated.

Article 6

The competent authority, after consulting the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, shall make special provision to protect confidential information transmitted or made available to it in accordance with Articles 8, 12, 13 or 14, whose disclosure would be liable to cause harm to an employer's business, so long as this provision does not lead to serious risk to the workers, the public or the environment.

PART III. RESPONSIBILITIES OF EMPLOYERS

IDENTIFICATION

Article 7

Employers shall identify any major hazard installation within their control on the basis of the system referred to in Article 5.

NOTIFICATION

Article 8

1. Employers shall notify the competent authority of any major hazard installation which they have identified:

(a) within a fixed time-frame for an existing installation;

(b) before it is put into operation in the case of a new installation.

2. Employers shall also notify the competent authority before any permanent closure of a major hazard installation.

ARRANGEMENTS AT THE LEVEL OF THE INSTALLATION

Article 9

In respect of each major hazard installation employers shall establish and maintain a documented system of major hazard control which includes provision for:

(a) the identification and analysis of hazards and the assessment of risks including consideration of possible interactions between substances;

(b) technical measures, including design, safety systems, construction, choice of chemicals, operation, maintenance and systematic inspection of the installation;

(c) organizational measures, including training and instruction of personnel, the provision of equipment in order to ensure their safety, staffing levels, hours of work, definition of responsibilities, and controls on outside contractors and temporary workers on the site of the installation;

(d) emergency plans and procedures, including:

  (i) the preparation of effective site emergency plans and procedures, including emergency medical procedures, to be applied in case of major accidents or threat thereof, with periodic testing and evaluation of their effectiveness and revision as necessary;

2. Le système mentionné au paragraphe 1 ci-dessus doit être revu et mis à jour régulièrement.

Article 6

Après consultation des organisations représentatives d'employeurs et de travailleurs intéressées, l'autorité compétente doit prendre des dispositions spéciales afin de protéger les informations confidentielles qui lui sont transmises ou fournies conformément à l'un quelconque des articles 8, 12, 13 ou 14, dont la divulgation serait de nature à nuire aux activités d'un employeur, pour autant que cette disposition n'entraîne pas de risque sérieux pour les travailleurs, la population ou l'environnement.

PARTIE III. RESPONSABILITÉS DES EMPLOYEURS

IDENTIFICATION

Article 7

Les employeurs doivent identifier toute installation à risques d'accident majeur dont ils ont le contrôle, sur la base du système visé à l'article 5.

NOTIFICATION

Article 8

1. Les employeurs doivent notifier à l'autorité compétente toute installation à risques d'accident majeur qu'ils auront identifiée:

a) selon un calendrier fixé dans le cas d'une installation existante;

b) avant sa mise en service dans le cas d'une nouvelle installation.

2. La fermeture définitive d'une installation à risques d'accident majeur doit également faire l'objet d'une notification préalable à l'autorité compétente par les employeurs.

DISPOSITIONS À PRENDRE AU NIVEAU DE L'INSTALLATION

Article 9

Pour toute installation à risques d'accident majeur, les employeurs doivent instituer et entretenir un système documenté de prévention et de protection de ces risques comportant:

a) l'identification et l'analyse des dangers ainsi que l'évaluation des risques, y compris la prise en considération des interactions possibles entre les produits;

b) des mesures techniques portant notamment sur la conception, les systèmes de sécurité, la construction, le choix de produits chimiques, le fonctionnement, l'entretien et l'inspection systématique de l'installation;

c) des mesures d'organisation portant notamment sur la formation et l'instruction du personnel, la fourniture d'équipement pour assurer sa sécurité, le niveau des effectifs, les horaires de travail, la répartition des responsabilités ainsi que le contrôle des entreprises extérieures et des travailleurs temporaires opérant sur le site de l'installation;

d) des plans et procédures d'urgence comportant notamment:

   i) l'élaboration de plans et de procédures d'urgence efficaces, y compris des procédures médicales d'urgence, à appliquer sur site en cas d'accident majeur ou de menace d'un tel accident, la vérification et l'évaluation périodiques de l'efficacité desdits plans et procédures et leur révision lorsque cela est nécessaire;

(ii) the provision of information on potential accidents and site emergency plans to authorities and bodies responsible for the preparation of emergency plans and procedures for the protection of the public and the environment outside the site of the installation;

(iii) any necessary consultation with such authorities and bodies;

(e) measures to limit the consequences of a major accident;

(f) consultation with workers and their representatives;

(g) improvement of the system, including measures for gathering information and analysing accidents and near misses. The lessons so learnt shall be discussed with the workers and their representatives and shall be recorded in accordance with national law and practice.

SAFETY REPORT

Article 10

1. Employers shall prepare a safety report based on the requirements of Article 9.

2. The report shall be prepared:

(a) in the case of existing major hazard installations, within a period after notification prescribed by national laws or regulations;

(b) in the case of any new major hazard installation, before it is put into operation.

Article 11

Employers shall review, update and amend the safety report:

(a) in the event of a modification which has a significant influence on the level of safety in the installation or its processes or in the quantities of hazardous substances present;

(b) when developments in technical knowledge or in the assessment of hazards make this appropriate;

(c) at intervals prescribed by national laws or regulations;

(d) at the request of the competent authority.

Article 12

Employers shall transmit or make available to the competent authority the safety reports referred to in Articles 10 and 11.

ACCIDENT REPORTING

Article 13

Employers shall inform the competent authority and other bodies designated for this purpose as soon as a major accident occurs.

Article 14

1. Employers shall, within a fixed time-frame after a major accident, present a detailed report to the competent authority containing an analysis of the causes of the accident and describing its immediate on-site consequences, and any action taken to mitigate its effects.

2. The report shall include recommendations detailing actions to be taken to prevent a recurrence.

ii) la fourniture d'informations sur les accidents possibles et les plans d'intervention sur site aux autorités et aux organes chargés d'établir les plans et les procédures d'intervention visant à protéger la population et l'environnement en dehors du site de l'installation;

iii) toutes consultations nécessaires avec ces autorités et organes;

e) des mesures visant à limiter les conséquences d'un accident majeur;

f) la consultation avec les travailleurs et leurs représentants;

g) des dispositions visant à améliorer le système, y compris des mesures pour rassembler des informations et analyser les accidents et les quasi-accidents. Les enseignements qui en sont tirés doivent être discutés avec les travailleurs et leurs représentants, et doivent être consignés, conformément à la législation et à la pratique nationale.

RAPPORT DE SÉCURITÉ

Article 10

1. Les employeurs doivent établir un rapport de sécurité conçu selon les prescriptions de l'article 9.

2. Le rapport doit être établi:

a) pour les installations à risques d'accident majeur existantes, dans le délai suivant la notification qui sera prescrit par la législation nationale;

b) pour toute nouvelle installation à risques d'accident majeur, avant sa mise en service.

Article 11

Les employeurs doivent réviser, mettre à jour et modifier le rapport de sécurité:

a) en cas de modification exerçant une influence significative sur le niveau de sécurité dans l'installation ou ses procédés, ou dans les quantités de produits dangereux présentes;

b) lorsque le progrès dans les connaissances techniques ou dans l'évaluation des dangers le justifie;

c) aux intervalles qui seront prescrits par la législation nationale;

d) à la demande de l'autorité compétente.

Article 12

Les employeurs doivent transmettre à l'autorité compétente, ou mettre à sa disposition, les rapports de sécurité visés aux articles 10 et 11.

RAPPORT D'ACCIDENT

Article 13

Dès qu'un accident majeur se produit, les employeurs doivent en informer l'autorité compétente et les autres instances désignées à cet effet.

Article 14

1. Après un accident majeur, et dans un délai préétabli, les employeurs doivent présenter à l'autorité compétente un rapport détaillé contenant une analyse des causes de cet accident et indiquant ses conséquences immédiates sur le site, ainsi que toute mesure prise pour en atténuer les effets.

2. Le rapport doit inclure des recommandations détaillées sur les mesures à prendre pour éviter que l'accident ne se reproduise.

OFF-SITE EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS

Article 15

Taking into account the information provided by the employer, the competent authority shall ensure that emergency plans and procedures containing provisions for the protection of the public and the environment outside the site of each major hazard installation are established, updated at appropriate intervals and coordinated with the relevant authorities and bodies.

Article 16

The competent authority shall ensure that:

(a) information on safety measures and the correct behaviour to adopt in the case of a major accident is disseminated to members of the public liable to be affected by a major accident without their having to request it and that such information is updated and redisseminated at appropriate intervals;

(b) warning is given as soon as possible in the case of a major accident;

(c) where a major accident could have transboundary effects, the information required in (a) and (b) above is provided to the States concerned, to assist in cooperation and coordination arrangements.

SITING OF MAJOR HAZARD INSTALLATIONS

Article 17

The competent authority shall establish a comprehensive siting policy arranging for the appropriate separation of proposed major hazard installations from working and residential areas and public facilities, and appropriate measures for existing installations. Such a policy shall reflect the General Principles set out in Part II of the Convention.

INSPECTION

Article 18

1. The competent authority shall have properly qualified and trained staff with the appropriate skills, and sufficient technical and professional support, to inspect, investigate, assess, and advise on the matters dealt with in this Convention and to ensure compliance with national laws and regulations.

2. Representatives of the employer and representatives of the workers of a major hazard installation shall have the opportunity to accompany inspectors supervising the application of the measures prescribed in pursuance of this Convention, unless the inspectors consider, in the light of the general instructions of the competent authority, that this may be prejudicial to the performance of their duties.

Article 19

The competent authority shall have the right to suspend any operation which poses an imminent threat of a major accident.

PART V. RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF WORKERS AND THEIR REPRESENTATIVES

Article 20

The workers and their representatives at a major hazard installation shall be consulted through appropriate cooperative mechanisms in order to ensure a safe system of work. In particular, the workers and their representatives shall:

PARTIE IV. RESPONSABILITÉS DES AUTORITÉS COMPÉTENTES

PLANS D'URGENCE HORS SITE

Article 15

En tenant compte des informations fournies par l'employeur, l'autorité compétente doit faire en sorte que des plans et procédures d'urgence comportant des dispositions en vue de protéger la population et l'environnement en dehors du site de chaque installation à risques d'accident majeur soient établis, mis à jour à des intervalles appropriés, et coordonnés avec les autorités et instances concernées.

Article 16

L'autorité compétente doit faire en sorte que:

a) des informations sur les mesures de sécurité à prendre et la conduite à suivre en cas d'accident majeur soient diffusées auprès des populations susceptibles d'être affectées par un accident majeur, sans qu'elles aient à le demander, et que ces informations soient mises à jour et rediffusées à intervalles appropriés;

b) en cas d'accident majeur, l'alerte soit donnée dès que possible;

c) lorsque les conséquences d'un accident majeur pourraient dépasser les frontières, les informations requises aux alinéas a) et b) ci-dessus soient fournies aux Etats concernés, afin de contribuer aux mesures de coopération et de coordination.

IMPLANTATION DES INSTALLATIONS À RISQUES D'ACCIDENT MAJEUR

Article 17

L'autorité compétente doit élaborer une politique globale d'implantation prévoyant une séparation convenable entre les installations à risques d'accidents majeur projetées et les zones résidentielles, les zones de travail ainsi que les équipements publics et, dans le cas d'installations existantes, toutes mesures convenables. Cette politique doit s'inspirer des principes généraux énoncés dans la partie II de la convention.

INSPECTION

1. L'autorité compétente doit disposer d'un personnel dûment qualifié, formé et compétent, s'appuyant sur suffisamment de moyens, de techniciens et de spécialistes pour inspecter, enquêter, fournir une évaluation et des conseils sur les questions traitées dans la convention et assurer le respect de la législation nationale.

2. Des représentants de l'employeur et des travailleurs d'une installation à risques d'accident majeur devront avoir la possibilité d'accompagner les inspecteurs lorsqu'ils contrôlent l'application des mesures prescrites en vertu de la présente convention à moins que ceux-ci n'estiment, à la lumière des directives générales de l'autorité compétente, que cela risque de porter préjudice à l'efficacité de leur contrôle.

L'autorité compétente doit avoir le droit de suspendre toute opération qui présente une menace imminente d'accident majeur.

PARTIE V. DROITS ET OBLIGATIONS DES TRAVAILLEURS ET DE LEURS REPRÉSENTANTS

Article 20

Dans une installation à risques d'accident majeur, les travailleurs et leurs représentants doivent être consultés, selon des procédures appropriées de coopération, afin d'établir un système de travail sûr. En particulier, les travailleurs et leurs représentants doivent:

(a) be adequately and suitably informed of the hazards associated with the major hazard installation and their likely consequences;

(b) be informed of any orders, instructions or recommendations made by the competent authority;

(c) be consulted in the preparation of, and have access to, the following documents:
  (i) the safety report;
  (ii) emergency plans and procedures;
  (iii) accident reports;

(d) be regularly instructed and trained in the practices and procedures for the prevention of major accidents and the control of developments likely to lead to a major accident and in the emergency procedures to be followed in the event of a major accident;

(e) within the scope of their job, and without being placed at any disadvantage, take corrective action and if necessary interrupt the activity where, on the basis of their training and experience, they have reasonable justification to believe that there is an imminent danger of a major accident, and notify their supervisor or raise the alarm, as appropriate, before or as soon as possible after taking such action;

(f) discuss with the employer any potential hazards they consider capable of generating a major accident and have the right to notify the competent authority of those hazards.

Article 21

Workers employed at the site of a major hazard installation shall:

(a) comply with all practices and procedures relating to the prevention of major accidents and the control of developments likely to lead to a major accident within the major hazard installation;

(b) comply with all emergency procedures should a major accident occur.

PART VI. RESPONSIBILITY OF EXPORTING STATES

Article 22

When, in an exporting member State, the use of hazardous substances, technologies or processes is prohibited as a potential source of a major accident, the information on this prohibition and the reasons for it shall be made available by the exporting member State to any importing country.

PART VII. FINAL PROVISIONS

Article 23

The formal ratifications of this Convention shall be communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for registration.

Article 24

1. This Convention shall be binding only upon those Members of the International Labour Organization whose ratifications have been registered with the Director-General.

2. It shall come into force 12 months after the date on which the ratifications of two Members have been registered with the Director-General.

3. Thereafter, this Convention shall come into force for any Member 12 months after the date on which its ratification has been registered.

a) être informés de manière suffisante et appropriée des dangers liés à cette installation et de leurs conséquences possibles;

b) être informés de toutes instructions ou recommandations émanant de l'autorité compétente;

c) être consultés lors de l'élaboration des documents suivants et y avoir accès:

  i) rapport de sécurité;
  ii) plans et procédures d'urgence;
  iii) rapports sur les accidents;

d) recevoir régulièrement des instructions et une formation sur les pratiques et procédures pour la prévention des accidents majeurs et la maîtrise des événements susceptibles de conduire à de tels accidents ainsi que sur les procédures d'urgence à suivre en cas d'accident majeur;

e) dans les limites de leur fonction et sans que cela puisse être retenu d'aucune manière à leur détriment, prendre des mesures correctives et, si nécessaire, interrompre l'activité lorsque, sur la base de leur formation et de leur expérience, ils ont un motif raisonnable de croire qu'il existe un danger imminent d'accident majeur, et en informer leur supérieur ou, selon le cas, déclencher l'alarme avant ou aussitôt que possible après avoir pris lesdites mesures;

f) discuter avec l'employeur de tout danger potentiel qu'ils considèrent susceptible de causer un accident majeur et avoir le droit de notifier ces dangers à l'autorité compétente.

Les travailleurs employés sur le site d'une installation à risques d'accident majeur doivent:

a) se conformer à toutes les pratiques et procédures se rapportant à la prévention des accidents majeurs et à la maîtrise des événements susceptibles de conduire à de tels accidents;

b) se conformer à toutes les procédures d'urgence au cas où un accident majeur viendrait à se produire.

PARTIE VI. RESPONSABILITÉ DES ETATS EXPORTATEURS

Article 22

Lorsque, dans un Etat Membre exportateur, l'utilisation de produits, technologies ou procédés dangereux est interdite en tant que source potentielle d'accident majeur, cet Etat devra mettre à la disposition de tout pays importateur les informations relatives à cette interdiction ainsi qu'aux raisons qui l'ont motivée.

PARTIE VII. DISPOSITIONS FINALES

Les ratifications formelles de la présente convention seront communiquées au Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail et par lui enregistrées.

Article 24

1. La présente convention ne liera que les membres de l'Organisation internationale du Travail dont la ratification aura été enregistrée par le Directeur général.

2. Elle entrera en vigueur douze mois après que les ratifications de deux Membres auront été enregistrées par le Directeur général.

3. Par la suite, cette convention entrera en vigueur pour chaque Membre douze mois après la date où sa ratification aura été enregistrée.

Article 25

1. A Member which has ratified this Convention may denounce it after the expiration of ten years from the date on which the Convention first comes into force, by an act communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for registration. Such denunciation shall not take effect until one year after the date on which it is registered.

2. Each Member which has ratified this Convention and which does not, within the year following the expiration of the period of ten years mentioned in the preceding paragraph, exercise the right of denunciation provided for in this Article, will be bound for another period of ten years and, thereafter, may denounce this Convention at the expiration of each period of ten years under the terms provided for in this Article.

Article 26

1. The Director-General of the International Labour Office shall notify all Members of the International Labour Organization of the registration of all ratifications and denunciations communicated to him by the Members of the Organization.

2. When notifying the Members of the Organization of the registration of the second ratification communicated to him, the Director-General shall draw the attention of the Members of the Organization to the date upon which the Convention will come into force.

Article 27

The Director-General of the International Labour Office shall communicate to the Secretary-General of the United Nations for registration in accordance with Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations full particulars of all ratifications and acts of denunciations registered by him in accordance with the provisions of the preceding Articles.

Article 28

At such times as it may consider necessary, the Governing Body of the International Labour Office shall present to the General Conference a report on the working of this Convention and shall examine the desirability of placing on the agenda of the Conference the question of its revision in whole or in part.

Article 29

1. Should the Conference adopt a new Convention revising this Convention in whole or in part, then, unless the new Convention otherwise provides–

(a) the ratification by a Member of the new revising Convention shall ipso jure involve the immediate denunciation of this Convention, notwithstanding the provisions of Article 25 above, if and when the new revising Convention shall have come into force;

(b) as from the date when the new revising Convention comes into force this Convention shall cease to be open to ratification by the Members.

2. This Convention shall in any case remain in force in its actual form and content for those Members which have ratified it but have not ratified the revising Convention.

Article 30

The English and French versions of the text of this Convention are equally authoritative.

Article 25

1. Tout Membre ayant ratifié la présente convention peut la dénoncer à l'expiration d'une période de dix années après la date de la mise en vigueur initiale de la convention, par un acte communiqué au Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail et par lui enregistré. La dénonciation ne prendra effet qu'une année après avoir été enregistrée.

2. Tout Membre ayant ratifié la présente convention qui, dans le délai d'une année après l'expiration de la période de dix années mentionnée au paragraphe précédent, ne fera pas usage de la faculté de dénonciation prévue par le présent article sera lié pour une nouvelle période de dix années et, par la suite, pourra dénoncer la présente convention à l'expiration de chaque période de dix années dans les conditions prévues au présent article.

Article 26

1. Le Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail notifiera à tous les Membres de l'Organisation internationale du Travail l'enregistrement de toutes les ratifications et dénonciations qui lui seront communiquées par les Membres de l'Organisation.

2. En notifiant aux Membres de l'Organisation l'enregistrement de la deuxième ratification qui lui aura été communiquée, le Directeur général appellera l'attention des Membres de l'Organisation sur la date à laquelle la présente convention entrera en vigueur.

Article 27

Le Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail communiquera au Secrétaire général des Nations Unies, aux fins d'enregistrement, conformément à l'article 102 de la Charte des Nations Unies, des renseignements complets au sujet de toutes ratifications et de tous actes de dénonciation qu'il aura enregistrés conformément aux articles précédents.

Article 28

Chaque fois qu'il le jugera nécessaire, le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail présentera à la Conférence générale un rapport sur l'application de la présente convention et examinera s'il y a lieu d'inscrire à l'ordre du jour de la Conférence la question de sa révision totale ou partielle.

Article 29

1. Au cas où la Conférence adopterait une nouvelle convention portant révision totale ou partielle de la présente convention, et à moins que la nouvelle convention ne dispose autrement:

a) la ratification par un Membre de la nouvelle convention portant révision entraînerait de plein droit, nonobstant l'article 25 ci-dessus, dénonciation immédiate de la présente convention, sous réserve que la nouvelle convention portant révision soit entrée en vigueur;

b) à partir de la date de l'entrée en vigueur de la nouvelle convention portant révision, la présente convention cesserait d'être ouverte à la ratification des Membres.

2. La présente convention demeurerait en tout cas en vigueur dans sa forme et teneur pour les Membres qui l'auraient ratifiée et qui ne ratifieraient pas la convention portant révision.

Article 30

Les versions française et anglaise du texte de la présente convention font également foi.

Recommendation 181

RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING THE PREVENTION OF MAJOR INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENTS

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its 80th Session on 2 June 1993, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the prevention of major industrial accidents, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a Recommendation supplementing the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention, 1993;

adopts this twenty-second day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-three the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Recommendation, 1993.

1. The provisions of this Recommendation should be applied in conjunction with those of the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention, 1993 (hereafter referred to as "the Convention").

2. (1) The International Labour Organization, in cooperation with other relevant international intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, should arrange for an international exchange of information on:

(a) good safety practices in major hazard installations including safety management and process safety;
(b) major accidents;
(c) lessons drawn from near misses;
(d) technologies and processes that are prohibited for reasons of safety and health;
(e) medical organization and techniques for dealing with the aftermath of a major accident;
(f) the mechanisms and procedures used by competent authorities to give effect to the implementation of the Convention and this Recommendation.

(2) Members should, as far as possible, communicate information on the matters listed in subparagraph (1) above to the International Labour Office.

3. The national policy provided for in the Convention and the national laws and regulations or other measures to implement it should, as appropriate, be guided by the ILO Code of practice on the Prevention of major industrial accidents, published in 1991.

4. Members should develop policies aimed at addressing the major accident risks, hazards and their consequences within the sectors and activities excluded from the scope of the Convention by virtue of Article 1, paragraph 3, thereof.

5. Recognizing that a major accident could have serious consequences in terms of its impact on human life and the environment, Members should encourage the establishment of systems to compensate workers as quickly as possible after the event and adequately address the effects on the public and the environment.

6. In accordance with the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, adopted by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, a national or multinational enterprise with more than one establishment should provide safety measures relating to the prevention of major accidents and the control of developments likely to lead to a major accident, without discrimination, to the workers in all its establishments, regardless of the place or country in which they are situated.

RECOMMANDATION CONCERNANT LA PRÉVENTION DES ACCIDENTS INDUSTRIELS MAJEURS

La Conférence générale de l'Organisation internationale du Travail,

Convoquée à Genève par le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail, et s'y étant réunie le 2 juin 1993 en sa 80^e session;

Après avoir décidé d'adopter diverses propositions relatives à la prévention des accidents industriels majeurs, question qui constitue le quatrième point de l'ordre du jour de la session;

Après avoir décidé que ces propositions prendraient la forme d'une recommandation destinée à compléter la convention sur la prévention des accidents industriels majeurs, 1993, adopte, ce vingt-deuxième jour de juin mil neuf cent quatre-vingt-treize, la recommandation ci-après, qui sera dénommée Recommandation sur la prévention des accidents industriels majeurs, 1993.

1. Les dispositions de la présente recommandation devraient s'appliquer conjointement avec celles de la convention sur la prévention des accidents industriels majeurs, 1993 (ci-après dénommée la convention).

2. (1) L'Organisation internationale du Travail, en collaboration avec d'autres organisations internationales concernées, intergouvernementales ou non gouvernementales, devrait prendre des dispositions en vue d'échanger, sur le plan international, des informations relatives:

a) aux bonnes pratiques de sécurité dans les installations à risques d'accident majeur, y compris la gestion de la sécurité et la sécurité des procédés;

b) aux accidents majeurs;

c) aux enseignements tirés des quasi-accidents;

d) aux technologies et procédés qui sont interdits pour des motifs de sécurité et de santé;

e) à l'organisation et aux techniques médicales destinées à faire face aux conséquences d'un accident majeur;

f) aux mécanismes et procédures utilisés par les autorités compétentes pour assurer l'application de la convention et de cette recommandation.

(2) Les Membres devraient, dans la mesure du possible, communiquer au Bureau international du Travail des informations au sujet des questions traitées au sous-paragraphe (1) ci-dessus.

3. La politique nationale prévue par la convention ainsi que la législation nationale ou d'autres mesures visant à lui donner effet devraient s'inspirer, en tant que de besoin, du Recueil de directives pratiques sur la prévention des accidents industriels majeurs, publié par le BIT en 1991.

4. Les Membres devraient élaborer des politiques visant à faire face aux risques et dangers d'accident majeur, et à leurs conséquences, dans les secteurs et activités exclus du champ d'application de la convention aux termes de son article 1 (3).

5. Reconnaissant qu'un accident majeur pourrait avoir des conséquences graves du fait de ses répercussions sur la vie humaine et l'environnement, les Membres devraient encourager la création de systèmes destinés à dédommager les travailleurs dès que possible après l'événement, et à faire face de manière adéquate aux effets de cet accident sur la population et l'environnement.

LISTA FINAL

La liste des délégations est présentée sous une forme trilingue dans l'ordre alphabétique français des pays représentés à la Conférence.

Toutes les informations concernant les noms des pays ou des organisations sont données en français, anglais et espagnol.

Les autres informations essentielles (titres et qualités des participants à la Conférence tels qu'ils figurent dans les pouvoirs officiels et fonctions exercées à la Conférence) sont indiquées dans une seule de ces langues: celle que doit utiliser le Bureau international du Travail dans la correspondance officielle avec le pays dont relève la personne intéressée.

The list of delegations is presented in trilingual form, in the French alphabetical order of the countries represented at the Conference.

All details relating to the names of countries and organisations are given in French, English and Spanish.

Other essential details (titles, positions or functions of participants as indicated in the official credentials and the Conference status of participants) are given in the language used for official correspondence between the ILO and the country in question.

En la lista trilingüe de delegaciones los países representados en la Conferencia figuran en orden alfabético francés.

Figuran en francés, inglés y español los nombres de los Estados y organizaciones asistentes a la Conferencia.

Por el contrario, los demás datos (títulos, profesiones y cargos de los participantes, tal como figuran en los poderes oficiales, y funciones ejercidas en la Conferencia) aparecen en la lengua utilizada por la Oficina Internacional del Trabajo para sus comunicaciones oficiales con el correspondiente Estado.
